B'WAY LEGIT'S ROCKETING COSTS

Teaching Teachers to Teach

Washington, April 30.

Labor Secretary Willard Wirtz told prospective college grads trained in the performing arts to think about teaching school.

In his "Open Letter to the College Graduates of 1963," Wirtz said the employment outlook for musicians, singers and dancers is better for school and college teaching than for performing.

Wirtz said competition is "especially keen" among performers and inexperienced people will face great difficulty in breaking into the performing arts field.

Showman, Who's Also Mayor, Finds Self Embarrassed by Negro Picketing

Raleigh, N.C., April 30.

Mayor W. G. Enloe said he would resign as a result of integration demonstrations at a theatre with which he is connected but changed his mind after he had called a special meeting of the City Council to announce that he would step down.

Enloe is an official of a chain which operates Raleigh's Ambassador Theatre, object of picketing demonstrations by Negro college students. Enloe already had decided against seeking re-election in this spring's City Council election.

He said the Varsity Theatre here, also owned by the chain, recently was integrated and experienced a drop in receipts and profits. Enloe added that integration was not the sole cause of the decline, but was a major factor. He said the Ambassador could not afford such losses.

He changed his mind about two hours before the Council because of negotiations in progress aimed at halting the picketing of the theatres.

Negro students from Shaw U. have been picketing the Ambassador Theatre here for some time.

Russell's Rocky Quip

Washington, April 30.

Political comedian Mark Russell (this is his hometown) is drawing loud yocks from the New Frontiersmen pouring into the Shoreham Hotel's Marquee Lounge with his observation that Nelson Rockefeller is a cinch to run for the Presidency in 1964.

"Who wouldn't want to get out of Albany?" Russell asks. "That's the kind of place where the late, late show goes on at 6:30 p.m."

Cafe Biz Up, But Crisis Not Over

New York niteries report that there has been some pickup in business following the end of Lent, resumption of newspaper operation and passing of the April 15 income tax deadline However, most cafes are unwilling to indicate that the crisis is over.

The aftermath of the aforementioned problems they claim, still lingers on and will remain for sometime. It will be a long, uphill struggle to get the nitery business back to its former levels.

The primary evil, according to bonifaces, lies in the fact that salesmen, executives and employees who

Bard's 400th Birthday; Longest-Run Dramatist To Be Widely Celebrated

London, April 30.

As part of next year's 400th anniversary of Shakespeare's birth the Royal Shakespeare Theatre is planning a world tour with two productions, one of which will be Peter Brook's "King Lear" and the other either "The Taming of the Shrew" or "A Midsummer Night's Dream," both directed by Peter Hall.

The tour, which is due to begin in February, will include Berlin, Budapest, Moscow, Leningrad, Helsinki, Tokyo and New York.

The 1964 season at Stratford-on-Avon will start on April 23 (Shakespeare's birthday) with "Richard II," to be followed by three other Kings plays. Other features of the anniversary celebrations will be the opening of an exhibition on the same day at the new Shakespeare Centre, and the issue of a new set of stamps by

MEXICANS BEAT TEXANS; SETS 'FEMOCRACY' FILM

Crystal City, Tex., April 30.

Mauricio De La Serna, a Mexican producer, is planning a motion picture of the Crystal City election in which candidates of Mexican descent were swept into office over Anglo-Saxon candidates. The film would emphasize democracy in action and the producer stated that it was a "natural."

Lalo Gonzales, the comic known as "Piporro," has been selected for the starring role. Serna said he hopes to make the film here if permission is obtained.

He said the story would go far back into history showing how the city had been founded by Mexicans.

200G FOR PLAYS, TUNERS TOP 500G

By JESSE GROSS

Steadily rising legit costs are pushing the average budget on Broadway productions toward $200,000 for straight plays and $500,000 for musicals. Not too long ago the respective figures were $100,000 or less and $250,000 to $300,000. Some shows are still brought in at comparable costs, but they're the exceptions to the rule.

The climb in musical expenditures, reflected in the capitalization of shows produced during the current season and past semesters, is vividly illustrated, though, in the financial structure of several 1963-64 prospects. Prominent among these are the tuner, "Jennie," budgeted at $500,000 with provision for 10% overcall which, if exercised, would boost the backing to $550,000, and a musical version of Terence Rattigan's "The Sleeping Prince," to be financed at $450,000 with provision for 20% overall which, if exercised, would bring the capitalization on the venture to $540,000.

Backing of $400,000, which could jump to $480,000 if a provision for 20% overcall is exercised, is being sought for "Sugar City," a musical version of "The Blue Angel" slated for Broadway unveiling in the fall. Also earmarked for Main Stem outings next season are the tuners, "Ben Franklin in Paris" on which the capitaliza-

Iceland 'Revenge' Vs. U.S. Military; Our Men Helped

Repercussions followed a VARIETY review from Goteborg, Sweden, of an Icelandic film production, "Gog" ('79 av Stodinni), which said in part, "Almost unbelievable is the participation in this feature of actual U.S. military personnel stationed at the Keflavik base but pictured as souses and girl-corrupters. The unknown director of an insignificant picture managed to get two "actors" from the local U.S. base, Keflavik on Iceland, to play roles of drunkards. One was John Teasy (he is "Bob" in the cast), is believed to be a U.S. actor who is in charge of the U.S. Army TV network of the Keflavik base Another was Lawrence W Scneph (his role is merely "US drunkard"). Both symbolized, per the film, the curse of America's "always present sin on the Nordic island and behave in a way the local population clearly despises The best thing said about Americans is a remark by

Rock 'n' Roll to Holy Rollers; That Ol' Time Religion New Nitery Motif

The store-front religion heard on a Sunday morning in the Harlem environs has reached the Times Square nitery belt. That old-time gospel-singing which surged on with a strong beat and even a stronger fervor has now made the long trip downtown to a new boite, The Sweet Chariot, based in the old Bal Tabarin site. The Holy Rollers have come in on a rock 'n' roll beat to sing their songs of exultation for audiences spurred on to involvement in the event with the beating of tambourines.

Some of the kids recently seen in the Twist parlors have apparently gotten off that kick and seem to be going in for religion. The youngsters, coming in with slacks and open shirts, provide the same kind of atmosphere initially evident at the Peppermint Lounge. They're fairly safe on financial grounds since the operator isn't clamping a minimum or a cover charge—for the time being, anyway—and they can get out with a check that is practically painless. The youngsters provide a lot of excitement, and many have become proficient in wielding of the tambourine which is handed to the customer. They pound them with the experitness of a gypsy dancer and with the fervor of a revivalist.

But more important is the direction in which the strong beat is carrying them. The kids have been following sounds and rhythm for many years. It has lead them into swing, boogiewoogie, rock 'n' roll and now to the currently Holy

Scions in the Groove

The offspring of show biz ites are continuing to spring out on records. Latest is a bunch-up of four in a new group known as The Cornells.

The group consists of Peter Lewis, son of Loretta Young, on guitar; Bob Linkletter, son of Art Linkletter, rhythm guitar; Jim O'Keefe, son of Dennis O'Keefe, saxophone; and Charles Correll Jr., son of the Amos 'n' Andy star, singer. The fifth member of the group is Tom Crumpaler, bass guitar, whose father is an industrialist but a non-pro.

The Cornells bow this week on the Garex label (distributed through United Artists) with a coupling of "Lone Star Stomp" and "Beachbound."

Liz-Dick's 'VIPs' Opposing 'Cleo'

London, April 30.

The British-made "VIPs" (MGM), starring Elizabeth Taylor and Richard Burton, is set for Radio City Music Hall this fall. It will follow "The Thrill of It All" (Col), Doris Day-James Garner starrer, which is due to open at the Hall in July or August. Thus Taylor-Burton will be playing against themselves in "Cleopatra" (20th), which will be on hardticket at the N.Y. Rivoli (due to open there in June).

SERMONS & PSALMS DEDICATE THEATRE

Minneapolis, April 30

On the afternoon of May 5 two days prior to its launching with "Hamlet," the new $2,200,000 Tyrone Guthrie Repertory Theatre here will hold "a service of dedication." This will be modeled after those at the festivals of Edinburgh and Canada's Stratford before each season's start.

Ceremony here will be conducted by Catholic, Protestant and Jewish divines. It'll include a Minneapolis church choir's numbers and a "choral recitation" by the entire Guthrie acting company.

Guthrie Theatre is placing emphasis on the fact it's repertory body will have as permanent members—at least for an entire 20-week season—Broadway types like Hume Cronyn and Jessica Tandy.

JFK Intimates He's 'Wired for Sound' As He Accepts RCA LPs

Washington, April 30

RCA Victor moved into the White House last week for presentation to President Kennedy of the first recordings ever made by the four U.S. service bands for public sale. The presentation was made by George R. Marek, Victor's veepee-general manager and Roger L. Stevens, chairman of the board of trustees of the National Cultural Center.

In a conversational play between the President and Marek the President said that he hoped everybody would buy and play them. When Marek responded with "I hope you'll play them" the President looked out the window of his office and said "I hear them all the time."

The four LPs, which contain military marches and patriotic songs of America played by the Army, Navy, Marine and Air Force bands, go on sale today (Wed.). All profits from the sale of the records will go to the National Cultural Center.

The project was a combined ef-

Irving Berlin, 75 Next Week, Tunes Up His First H'wood Filmusical in 9 Years

By ABEL GREEN

Irving Berlin will be 75 next week and, after a decade of quasi-"retirement" (a euphemism, because he always "works" his valuable music publishing catalog of standards), the songsmith will have a Metro filmusical, "Say It With Music," in work. This comes on the heels of his current legit musical, "Mr. President," which has been his first Broadway show in over a decade. "Call Me Madam" (1950) was the last Berlin legit. And after two almost concurrent filmusicals, both in 1954, "There's No Business Like Show Business" (20th) and "White Christmas" (Par), now comes this "Say It With Music" package.

Berlin's "retirements,"—the first one was intended and a second one was enforced by illness—were never taken seriously. In fact, Berlin's well-wishers have noticed that the greatest physical tonic has been the activity attendant to "Mr. President," which again attests to the axiom that success and keeping busy are the best medicine.

Now the last, Berlin at 75 is undertaking what he feels may climax his career because "Say It With Music" will give producer Arthur Freed and director Vincente Minelli "a free hand to take the pick of my catalog," says Berlin.

A reprise of the shrewd manner in which Berlin ploughs under and revitalizes his catalog points up the significant usages of song titles which have become picture packages. In fact one film tag, "White Christmas" (Par, 1952), with Bing

Ariola's Historical LP on Belsen a Grim Reminder of Hitler Era

Berlin, April 30.

The German Ariola diskery has released an LP which reminds Germans of their most gruesome historical chapter, the liquidation of the Jews Entitled "Das Mahnmal" (The Monitorial Sign), this documentary preserves the words which the former Federal German President, Theodor Heuss, spoke Nov 30, 1952 at the inauguration of the memorial stone in the former Nazi concentration camp of Bergen-Belsen where, incidentally, also Anne Frank was killed.

Heuss urges the Germans never to forget nor to belittle what happened under Hitler. They must have the courage and inner freedom to recognize the full extent of the gruesome crimes that were committed by the Germans. His words are mild but firm and he sounds honest when he says:

"Perhaps some may be astonished to hear this but I heard the word 'Bergen-Belsen' for the first

Hope's New Book By Top Standup Comic Is Top Marathon Moaning

What do you expect when you buy a book titled "I Owe Russia $1,200" (Doubleday; $3.95) by Bob Hope? Laughs? Gags? One-liners linked together in a chain reaching 'round th world? Right—and that's what you get, the longest standup monolog in history delivered by the king of the standup comedians and illustrated by eyewitness photos by NBC, MGM, UA, Paramount, Paul Bailey, Gerald K. Smith and Look Magazine. Never a dull page.

The book itself is a r/c. Hope doesn't owe Russia $1,200. He doesn't owe Russia a Red cent. And his book doesn't have much to do with the title. He starts telling the story about Russia on page 7, interrupts himself on page 17 with 186 pages of amusing miscellany, picks up the title topic again to wrap it up in 41 pages and runs on to update the volume with 16 pages on his 1962 Yule tour. (The title relates to his nonpayment of a $1,200 charge made by the Soviet government for filmstrips still unreceived).

In his 272 pages of first person singular Bob covers his experiences on his annual entertainment missions to American Armed Forces

Val Guest Signs 'Chris' As Personal Adviser

London, April 30.

Val Guest, just completing his latest picture "80,000 Suspects," has revealed the signing of ex-Fleet Street editor Arthur Christiansen as his personal consultant and adviser in development of a $5,600,000 production program.

The two men had been friends for years before they came together in pictures when Christiansen was used as technical advisor and actor (he played himself) for Guest's "Day the Earth Caught Fire." Christiansen is cast as another editor in "80,000 Suspects."

ALLEN LUDDEN

Host of "PANEWORD" on CBS Television Network, says:

"PAUL was a real asset to our program and we would be delighted with his return to the show at any time."

Jaw-Drop Stuff: Brando Vs. Alpert

Considering Marlon Brando's emphasis on the need for newsmen to report accurately and with responsibility, in the course of his appearance on David Susskind's Open End (WNEW-TV) last Sunday (21), there is an amusing postscript which actually took place before Brando's taped appearance was on the air.

On the Susskind show, Brando singled out Hollis Alpert, a regular contributor to the Saturday Review, for having evidenced such a lack of responsibility. According to the actor, Alpert came to interview him clothed in the name of the highly respectable Saturday Review. He liked the Saturday Review and he liked Alpert, said Brando, who continued:

"Three weeks later, four weeks later, whatever it was—I think it was Redbook Magazine. I just dropped my jaw down to my navel when I saw a cheesy, two-bit, ordinary, run-of-the-mill rehash of some of the old columnists' publicity about what was purported to be my personal life, and the explanation: 'The Real Marlon Brando.'

"And at the end of the article

Greer Garson Joining Other Show Biz Celebs On KIXL Directors Bd.

Dallas, April 30.

Film star Greer Garson, wife of local oilman Buddy Fogelson, has been nominated for a place on the board of directors of KIXL.

"We will act on the nomination at our stockholders meeting in May," said KIXL prez Lee Segall. "If she becomes a member of the board, Miss Garson will be in good company. Stockholders include Robert Taylor, William Holden and Tony Martin. The late Tyrone Power also held stock in the organization."

Miss Garson maintains an apartment here and is currently in New York, but is expected back in the city during the forthcoming stockholders meeting.

OUR SONS THE DOCTORS

Playwright Lawrence & Lee's Dual Bartenders

Are there two doctors in the house? There soon will be in the playwrighting menage of Lawrence & Lee. Jerome Lawrence will be given an honorary Doctor of Humane Letters by Ohio State University on June 7. Last June, his partner, Robert E. Lee, was made a Doctor of Literature by Ohio Wesleyan.

Membership in two honorary fraternities has also been conferred on the playwriting team. Lawrence was just initiated into Sigma Delta Chi, the national journalism fraternity. Lee was made a member of Theta Alpha Phi, the national dramatic honor fraternity.

Russo's Definite Maybe

Paris, April 26.

Official "management representative" of the Moscow Circus, currently playing here, was interviewed by a Variety man who was innocent enough to think he could get some information. Something like this:

VM: How many cities will you appear in, in America?

M.R.: We don't know. That's up to Washington.

VM: Which artists will be in the cast for the American tour?

M.R.: We don't know. That's up to Moscow.

VM: How long will the tour last?

M.R.: That's up to the governments.

VM: Are you anxious to go to America?

M.R.: Oh, yes. We are looking forward to it. We want the Americans to see our great Russian artists.

VM: Aren't you worried about the reaction in Russia to the American circus which will come over from the U.S. in exchange?

M.R.: No, it is good that our people see great entertainment from everywhere; that way they will realize that our artists are best.

VM: There will be two American circuses in Europe but only one will go to Russia. The biggest and most important American circus is Ringling Bros., which you will not be seeing. Why not?

M.R.: Because this is not truly an American circus, it has mostly international artists. What we want to show the Russian people is American art.

VM: Why?

M.R.: You are writing for an American newspaper, are you not?

VM: Yes.

M.R.: Well, tell the American people that what we want to see is the best from America, not from Switzerland, Holland or other places.

VM: Can I quote you on that?

M.R.: Why not? I have nothing to hide.

VM: How do I spell your name?

M.R.: No name. If you want an official statement go to the government.

VM: Can I phone you in a few days to get more details, or to see if any changes have been made.

M.R.: Surely. Why not?

VM: Will you be here at the same hotel?

M.R.: No, I am leaving tomorrow to go to another city.

VM: What city?

M.R.: I don't know. The Embassy will tell me.

Joe Levine's Predicament — Italians Okay Israeli Girl Conscripts in Bathhouse Frolic

LOUISVILLE DERBY DAY GETTING LOTSA BALLY

Louisville, April 30.

Biggest local event of the year, the Kentucky Derby on Saturday (3), is getting lotsa buildup with Derby Festival Week events. Fanfare will tee off with the Louisville Orch playing a curbs pops concert followed by a fireworks display aboard the Belle of Louisville, excursion boat which has been rebuilt and financed by local city and county funds.

The Derby Festival Show, an annual affair sponsored by Phillip Morris, with Raymond Burr, and featuring Tex Ritter,, Minnie Pearl, Faron Young, and other country music entertainers, will be held at Freedom Hall at the Kentucky Fair & Exposition Center Wednesday (1). The Pegasus Parade, with some 60 bands and 30 floats, is shedded for Thursday (2), all leading up to the 89th "Run For the Roses" Kentucky Derby next Saturday at Churchill Downs.

Fuss stirred up by the Israeli government over the appearance in the Italian film "Women of the World" of undraped femme soldiers is now getting Joe Levine into the act. The distrib-producer's Embassy Pictures has rights to the film and, while in Rome recently, Levine was contacted by someone claiming to represent the Israeli government who asked the distrib to cut the segment in question out of the pic.

When it first discovered the situation, the Israeli embassy in Rome has sought the intervention of the Italian government to snip the scene but the official answer was that the Italian government doesn't interfere with the film censors and they approved the pic. The Italian censor, usually careful on the matter of femme nudity, had been more liberal in this case because of the documentary nature of the film.

Meanwhile, Levine is waiting for someone bearing official credentials of some sort to make a formal request of him. Otherwise, he says,

FANS-ACROSS-SEAS FESTIVAL

'Political Film Cycle' Coming?

Upcoming American films dealing with contemporary Washington politics (in fictional terms) is interpreted by some tradesters as indicating that domestic filmmakers (and, hopefully, the public) are at long last becoming aware of the drama of the real world.

Until Otto Preminger last year came out with Allen Drury's "Advise and Consent," there had hardly been a major Hollywood film utilizing top Washington politicos as principal characters since 1933's "Gabriel Over the White House," of which a VARIETY reviewer wrote: "A mess of political tripe superlatively hoked up." The picture, which had to do with God's intervention to allow a mortally injured President to stay alive until he had resolved depression problems, was Walter Wanger's first as Metro's production supervisor.

Likely to the most controversial, as well as off-beat, is Stanley Kubrick's "Dr. Strangelove: Or How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb," now nearing the end of production and tentatively set for Columbia release this fall.

Also due for Columbia is "Fail-Safe," which, like "Strangelove," has to do with Washington diplomacy and nuclear annihilation. Upcoming are the Seven Arts-Paramount adaptation of "Seven Days in May," dealing with an attempted coup d'etat in Washington, and Gore Vidal's "The Best Man," which Millar-Turman Productions are prepping for United Artists. It has to do with behind-the-scenes shenanigans leading up to a Presidential nomination.

Newspaper Strike Echoes in First Quarter Slump for Trans-Lux Corp.

Trans-Lux Corp. earnings for the first 1963 quarter, ended March 31, dropped approximately $60,000 to $142,718, compared to $202,000 for the comparable period last year. Per share earnings for 1963 quarter were 20 cents, against 28 cents last year. Results were disclosed in New York Thursday (30) at the annual stockholders meeting.

Chairman Purcival Furber reported himself unconcerned about quarter results, saying they would "average out" during balance of year. He blamed drop on theatre operations, as well as "non-recurring development expenses," both for new theatres and work on a new projector for T-L's high-speed ticker.

Prexy Richard Brandt specifically pinpointed blame for theatre operations decline on N.Y. newspaper strike, which made opening of new pix risky. Brandt also reported company's tv branch has just completed a pilot of a new series to be called "Mack and Meyer for Hire," starring Joey Faye and Mickey Deems.

'Matador' to Apjac For Seville Shooting; Other Arthur Jacobs' Films

Hollywood, April 30.

Arthur P. Jacobs has purchased Barnaby Conrad's "Matador" for filming next April in Seville, Spain. Conrad retains percentage in the production and will function as technical advisor on the film.

"Matador," which to date has sold 3,000,000 in 15 international printings, originally was owned by John Huston and Jose Ferrer, who let rights return to Conrad within past few months.

Jacobs has set $600,000 budget on picture, to be made simultaneously in Spanish and English languages. Conrad will go to Seville for the annual festival this July with a second unit to shoot background material.

Property brings to four number on Jacobs' Apjac slate since the former flack turned producer less than a year ago. He is partnered with J. Lee Thompson, under latter's Malibu Productions banner, on two films, among them slated kickoff of "I Love Louisa," set for July 8 start in Hollywood. Thompson directs on $2,500,000 budget from script now completed by Betty Comden and Adolph Green. Second with Thompson is just-acquired "Return to the Ashes." French novel by Hubert Monteilhet to be filmed here. Picture is expected to start in January from script by Thompson, who will direct, with $1,500,000 budget set. Partners have a Mirisch-UA deal on "Louisa," but have not set releases on other pix.

Third film on slate is "Stop the Producer-director Danny Arnold is now filming a sketch with Lewis, to be screened at the griddron-type dinner. Show is sold out.

Supreme Ct. To Review Ohio Ban Of 'The Lovers'

Washington, April 30.

The U.S. Supreme Court has scheduled the appeal of Nico Jacobellis, Ohio theatre man who was convicted in Ohio for showing an obscene film ("The Lovers"), for reargument, probably during the next session of the court, starting in September. Case was originally heard by the court earlier this year.

It's understood that the court asked for reargument in order to further pursue the point of whether or not one state can ban a work which has been found unobjectionable in another state. Issue involved is the key one of state's rights.

Court is also interested in the Jacobellis case in conjunction with similar question raised in another case it's considering, Smith vs. California, which is the appeal of a bookseller who was found guilty in selling the "objectionable" "Tropic of Cancer." Both will be heard together.

SHOOT ROUND CLOCK

June Wilkinson Praises Production In Brazil

Columbus, O., April 30.

June Wilkinson, appearing here in "Pajama Tops" at Veterans Memorial, said her film company, Phoenix Productions (she's prexy), is producing films in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, because "we can get twice the value we get in Hollywood. There are no union restrictions. We can shoot around the clock. Also, the Brazilian tax is only 10%."

She's persuaded several of her backers, American business men, to plow back picture profits toward future larger-budget pix with greater earning potential than low-budget films now shooting.

Phoenix was organized with help of frozen assets in Brazil.

LONDON'S PICKS AT N.Y. CENTER

Upcoming film festival being sponsored by New York's Lincoln Center of the Performing Arts, Sept. 16-15 this year is being projected as an annual affair, it was reported yesterday (Tues.) by Amos Vogel, exec secretary of Cinema 16 who is acting as the Center's fest coordinator. In a collaborative effort with the British Film Institute, Center's program of 20 features will be the same as those chosen for showing at the annual London film fest, held in October. The London fest spotlights what it considers the most interesting product shown at the competitive film fests earlier in the year, though not necessarily the prize-winners. Like London, the Center fest is non-competitive.

In conjunction with the Lincoln Center fest, the Museum of Modern Art will be showing, in its auditorium, a special program of "distinguished films of the past decade" which have never before been shown in New York. There will be 10 pix in this program.

Fest budget, which is estimated at between $80,000 and $110,000, will provide for the transportation to and from New York, as well as all expenses while in the city, for five top directors who will be asked to attend in connection with the showing of their films. Also being invited are the heads of other leading international festivals.

As now blueprinted, each film will be shown once, with screening scheduled for late afternoon and night during the 10-day run. Pix will be shown at Philharmonic Hall, whose 2,500-plus seats will be scaled from $1.50 to $3.50, with special discounts offered with purchase of tickets to five or more different films. Richard Roud, organizer of the London fest, will be picking the program for both London and the Center, though, because the Center affair starts so soon after the conclusion of the Venice fest, it may be that the Center will show one or two pix from last year's Venice fest, rather than this year's.

Among the industry execs already on the fest's sponsoring committee, chaired by August Heckscher, special consultant on the arts to President Kennedy, are Barney Balaban, Darryl F. Zanuck, Joe E. Levine, Arthur Mayer, Si Fabian, Leonard Goldenson, Sam Goldwyn, Arthur Krim, Ed Morrow, Robert H. O'Brien, Harry Mandell, Otto Preminger, Walter Reade Jr., Robert W. Sarnoff, Abe Schneider, Dan Rugoff, Elia Kazan, David Selznick, Frank Stanton, Billy Wilder, Fred Zinnemann, Laurence Tisch.

Loew's Gross Up, Net Off, 26 Weeks

Loew's Theatres Inc. registered a major gain in gross and a large drop in net earnings for the 26 weeks ended Feb. 28, representing the first half of the current fiscal year, Laurence A. Tisch, chairman, disclosed in New York this week.

After a tax provision of $400,000 and depreciation of $2,316,000, the net for the period amounted to $682,100, equal to 26c per share of common stock. Comparable period last year brought gross revenues of $20,205,000 and, after $1,247,000 for taxes and $1,505,000 for depreciation, a net of $1,166,600, equal to 44c per common share.

Earnings for the second quarter ended Feb. 28 amounted to $282,200, equal to 11c per share, compared with $640,200, or 24c per share, a year ago.

Loew's stock last week traded at $17 and a fraction, just about low for the year, against a high of $23.75.

South African Government a Lulu For Cooperation on Levine's 'Zulu'

Back from a visit to the Republic of South Africa and the set there of his and Paramount's coproduction of "Zulu," Joseph E. Levine brings word that the white enterprisers are eager for more film activity. He was impressed by government helping "Zulu." It made available Army elements, livestock, natives, local labor, equipment such as weapons and much besides. He also notes that there is a strong interest on the part of Johannesburg financeers to have more film production come to South Africa, particularly if some coproduction can be arranged.

So anxious are the South Africans to lure production, Levine reports, that a company has been formed there, called S&L Films, which has purchased filming equipment, including camera accessories, busses and such. These items are for rent to companies working there, thereby saving the great trouble and expense involved in transporting such equipment from Europe or the United States. "Zulu" company is using this rental service.

"Zulu" is being shot near Natal. Although his recent thinking has been to use U.S. locations for future product, Levine says that he was wooed to the point of considering leasing his "Sands of Calahari" project in South Africa, using this as opposed to a western U.S. desert. He points out that South Africa is beautiful and of varied scenics for location work.

Evidence of local cooperation is demonstrated by "Zulu's" location shoots which show things like 200 soldiers, 100 Levies, 2,500 Zulus, 550 horses, 200 head of cattle, 200 men for local labor, 12 soldiers for radio communication, aircraft, six cheetas, four leopards, two lions, six elephants, 40 giraffes, six zebras, plus rifles, spears, shields, rounds of ammunition and soforth. Much of this is being supplied by the natives, the government or S&L Films. It's all considerably cheaper than it would be in the States too, natch.

LONDON'S 2D HOUSE FOR C'RAMA: COLISEUM

London's West End is to have its second Cinerama theatre with the conversion of the Coliseum on St. Martin's Place to the dimensional system.

House has been on Metro lease, which expires this month, and opens in July upon completion of the adaptation. "Wonderful World of Brothers Grimm" is initial entry.

London's Casino was first to go C'rama. Others slated for conversion in the British Isles, as disclosed yesterday (Tues.) by C'rama president Nicolas Reisini, are the A.B.C. and the Gaumont in Birmingham, Coliseum is in Glasgow and the Queens, Newcastle.

Col Absorbs Filmverlelh In Munich Stepup

By JOHN KAFKA

Munich, April 30.

Filmverleih, distribution wing of Bavaria Film, has been absorbed by Columbia Pictures of New York with the new releasing organization named Columbia-Bavaria-Filmgesellschaft. Columbia has taken over the stock of product, office facilities and clientele, along with liabilities which resulted from last year's losses.

Newly-constituted Col company will now release its own product, the turnout of Bavaria and at least 10 features a year to be made by Constellation, which is Col's production unit here.

New setup is of particular interest in European film circles because American companies have been shy of making deals with Teutonic pic enterprises. Precedent was in the late 1920's when UFA became enmeshed with Paramount and Metro in the long defunct PARUFAMET.

Present deal does not stop at the confines of distribution. Filmkunst, Bavaria's not very active production mill, is submerging in Constellation via stock transfer and Constellation, in its own filmmaking, has first call on Bavaria's production sound stages.

All this obviously could have a bearing on Col's production in Europe, such as switching much camera work from Madrid, Rome or Yugoslavia to Munich. Same could obtain if Col television subsidiary Screen Gems formalizes presently-vague plans to do a series on the Continent.

FESTIVAL-DESTINED

Kramer to Moscow—Peck, Lee, Rivkin, Others to Cannes

Hollywood, April 30.

Stanley Kramer, at invitation of U.S. State Dept., will be the U.S. juror at Moscow Film Festival, opening July 7. No decision yet has been reached on what American pic will be sent to Soviet fest, but Allen Rivkin, repping Hollywood Film Festivals Committee which selects official entries to all such affairs states there definitely will be an entry.

Joining Gregory Peck and Harper Lee at May 8-23 Cannes Film Festival will be Alfred Hitchcock, Tippi Hedren, Alan Pakula and Bette Davis. "To Kill a Mockingbird" is official U.S. entry here, but "The Birds" and "What Ever Happened to Baby Jane?" will be unofficial entries. Other Cannes U.S. reps will be Reuben Mamoulian, Rivkin and MPEA's Frederick Gronich.

Dave Emanuel Reps N.Y. Importers at Cannes Fest; Group Hurrahs Irv Levin

David Emanuel, prexy of Clarewood Films, has been named by the Independent Film Importers & Distributors of America to serve as its official delegate to the Cannes film fest, May 8-22. Emanuel also is a member of IFIDA's governing committee.

The organization's board also has voted to support the aims and objectives of this year's San Francisco film fest this fall. Board unanimously passed a resolution approving of the fest and commending its director, Irving M. Levin, for "his activities on behalf of outstanding motion pictures."

The IFIDA fest and awards committee, headed by Jean Goldwurm, will act as liaison with the San Francisco fest.

Latin Reps Gather In Mexico to Hear Poe

Twentieth-Fox exec veep Seymour Poe leaves New York today (Wed.) for Mexico City to preside at a two-day merchandising conference Thursday and Friday (2-3) of the company's Latin American reps Manny Silverstone, exec with 20th-Fox International. Karl Knust, supervisor for Latin America and the Far East and Harold Rand, global publicity director, preceded Poe to Mexico City yesterday (Tues.).

Among the delegates attending the conference will be reps from Metro in Puerto Rico, Colombia, Peru and Chile where Metro handles 20th product. It's expected that Poe will announce opening dates for various "Cleopatra" engagements following the L. A. preem in Caracas in August.

N.Y. Makers Face Forced Arbitration

Directors Want Pension Payments on Weekly Basis, Not Studio-Work Days

The N. Y. Appellate Division judges last Friday (26) rejected an appeal by the Film Producers Assn. of New York which had sought to avoid arbitration proceedings on two cases brought by the Screen Directors International Guild effecting payment of pension plan monies. Concurrently, two groups are virtually deadlocked in negotiations for a new work contract, the latter having obtained strike authorization from its membership last week.

Legal situation arises out of a dispute over how pension money is to be paid by producers. Producers want to pay only for the actual days a director works while the SDIG is seeking payment on a weekly staff basis, regardless of how many days in the week a director may actually leave. The dispute is the result of some ambiguity in agreements between the two covering this point and, when problems arose, directors sought arbitration.

Producers rebelled against the arbitration idea and went to court. A while back, the Supreme Court of N. Y. had ruled in favor of arbitration and now the Appellate division has concurred. SDIG has its arbitration proceedings on file and is planning to press for hearings.

This court ruling is also N. Y. producers vexation in its contract talks with the directors. It is possible, however, that negotiations will cover the pension matter and thereby avoid the need for the distasteful arbitration. In the negotiations, the producers have proposed pension payment for four days work, even if only one day is actually spent leaving. These talks are in an almost stalemated state at present, however, both sides having presented their package deals and each finding the other's unacceptable.

Andrew Solt's Madrid Deal With Michael Wayne

Hollywood, April 30.

Andrew Solt has slotted production in Spain this Fall of "What's That in Preston?" from a screenplay by Michael Fessier. He's negotiating on a coproduction deal with Mike Wayne, a production chief for Samuel Bronston.

Andrew Marton will direct and already set to topline cast is Spanish actor Simon Andreu, star of this year's official Spanish entry in upcoming Cannes Film Festival, "El Buen Amor."

PUERTO RICAN REHRS SUIT VS. CINERAMA

Commonwealth Theatres of Puerto Rico filed suit in N.Y. Federal Court Friday (26) seeking $2,500,000 in damages because of Cinerama's alleged failure to build a Cinerama theatre in Santurce, P.R. Defendants are Cinerama Inc. and exhibitor Charles Reagan. According to the suit, Cinerama entered into a contract with Commonwealth on Sept. 15, 1962, and later notified the plaintiff that it would not be able to build the house.

Suit charges Reagan with maliciously persuading Cinerama to repudiate the contract with Commonwealth. In addition, it says that Cinerama and Reagan have threatened to enter into a contract whereby Reagan would be licensed to show first-run Cinerama releases in San Juan, of which Santurce is one section. Commonwealth asks that Cinerama be forced to build the theatre as specified in the original contract, and that Cinerama be enjoined from making a deal with Reagan.

Andrews's Settlement Hearing Set For May 24 In N.Y. Court

N.Y. Supreme Court Justice Birdie Amsterdam Wednesday (24) signed an order setting May 24 as the hearing date for a settlement plan on a stockholders' suit against former 20th-Fox prexy Spyros P. Skouras and former and present directors of 20th. Settlement plan for the suit, brought by Larry Silverberg, Abe Feldman and Celia Wolf, was disclosed in January and involved Skouras' acceptance of a salary reduction from $260,000 to $75,000 for the period from July 1, 1962 to Dec. 31, 1965. Former prexy also renounced rights to $62,500 in deferred salary for 1961. Plan had been submitted by court-appointed referee Samuel Conrad Cohen.

At May 24 hearing, parties will also be asked to confirm referee's report that settlement is fair and reasonable. Referee in his report absolved Skouras from any charges of improper acts, as outlined in the suit, re expenses and stock options.

New York Sound Track

Add New Yorkers headed for the Cannes fest: Richard Davis, Marshall Schacher, Irvin Shapiro . . . Bernie Wilson, head of the east coast film department of the William Morris Agency, will also touch at Cannes in the course of his current European biz swing. . . . J. Lee Thompson's Melton Productions and Arthur P. Jacobs' Apjac Productions have purchased screen rights to "Return from The Ashes," to be made as a joint venture late this year—after they do "I Love Louisa," of which Elizabeth Taylor is no longer mentioned as star.

George Chakiris off to Rome for role opposite Claudia Cardinale in "Duke's Girl" . . . Anything for an item: Max Max Weitman, a Westport cat, has been signed for a role in "Diary of A Bachelor" . . . Publicist Tommy Cullia, formerly associated with Bobby Darin and Tony Curtis, has joined Solters, O'Rourke & Sabinson. . . . Members of the Tagore Society will observe the 102nd anniversary of the birth of Rabindranath Tagore May 6 by attending a showing of "Two Daughters," adapted from two of his stories, at the Cinema II.

Columbia Pictures exec weepee Leo Jaffe stresses that Max E. Youngstein's "Fail-Safe" is the only single venture for the company "if Max comes up with some other property at a future date he may do another for us," but he asserts that he is not becoming a studio executive. "We have very able production toppers in Sol Schwartz and Mike Frankovich," he adds.

Joseph E. Levine repairs back to work at Paramount Studios today (Wed.), planning to the Coast for confabs with Josh Logan on the soon-to-roll "Carpetbaggers" . . . composer-arranger Billy Glenn will score "Gone Are the Days" (not "Purple Victorious"), penning, among others, an original love song and a satirical comment ditty (film comments on Southern segregation) . . . UA Records is releasing the soundtrack LP from "Divorce—Italian Style," with promotional tie-ins set to follow the pic's showings, special displays and other ideas . . . the title of the Levine-Carlo Ponti coproduction filmization of Alberto Moravia's "Ghost At Noon" will probably be changed to "Contempt."

There's an "Archie Leach" role in "Act One" and producer Dore Schary gave it to young actor Burt Cason, it is, of course, Cary Grant's pre-film maiden name . . . Bette Davis and producer-director Robert Aldrich off this month on a tour of Europe to blabbermouth about "What Ever Happened to Baby Jane?" The Cannes fest is on the agenda . . . Cliff Robertson, Jane Fonda, Rod Taylor, producer Everett Freeman and director Peter Tewksbury to Culver City after eight days of exteriorizing "Sunday in New York" here . . . Norman King of freeze King doing a 30-city tour to tell the virtues of "Captain Sinbad."

Maybe even VARIETY should start (or stop) worrying about its "image." There is a scene in the French film, "Tire-au-Flanc" (The Army Game), currently at the Bleecker, in which a skywriter is shown spelling out "Cahiers du Cinema." The subtitles translate that as "Read VARIETY."

Ronald Neame inked to two-pix pact by Mirisch Co. . . . "The Great Race," originally slated as Mirisch production, now goes to Warner Bros. as a Burt Lancaster-Jack Lemmon item . . . Steve Brodie repeats his Broadway role in Metro's production of "The Unsinkable Molly Brown" . . . Richard Bernstein to produce Booth Tarkington's "Penrod and Sam" . . . Joe Pasternak acquired Hans Williams' novel, "Company Girls" for his Metro slate . . . Claude Rains cast as Herod in George Stevens' "Greatest Story Ever Told" . . . Gene Barry purchased Jack Usher tome, "The Fox," for indie production under his Barbary banner . . . Slim Pickens snagged role in Columbia Pictures' "Dr. Strangelove" and left for London leaning.

Ann Bonnell the composer and lyricist is now to the advisory board of Joe Madden's Interlochen Arts Academy in Michigan along with Leonard Goldenson, Hugh Downs and Walter Toscanini.

Paulette (Mrs. John H.) Nathan and the yet late veteran film executive's two sons, John E. and Robert H. Nathan, took the Paramount executive's body back to Paris for interment. He was long domiciled abroad as g.m. of Par's Continental Europe, Middle East and North Africa distribution operations. His sons also reside abroad. The widow is French, the former Paulette Genevois.

Roving film columnist Sheilah Graham who is so much east that she maintains a permanent Manhattan apartment when she is not on the Coast or overseas now has the Tuesday and Saturday columnar slot in the N.Y. Mirror formerly occupied by the late Lee Mortimer. This is in addition to her regular film chatter stint.

Producer Maurice King unveiled his newest, "Captain Sinbad," in Charlotte, N.C., where 75 press reps and exhibs were hosted by Metro branch manager Amos Bapotte . . . Wm Dick Lederer and Ernie Grossman to Burbank re the campaigns for "My Fair Lady" and "Two for Texas." Jack L. Warner is personally supervising production of "Fair Lady."

Producer Walter Wanger is so high on the "Cleopatra" script he thinks it should be published in book form . . . Ruth Pelage, American International's eastern publicity manager, in Hollywood this week . . . Sam Baker's Associated Independent Theatres opens its new 550-seat Kings Park Theatre, Kings Park, L. I. today (Wed.) . . . British director Lindsay Anderson has returned to London. His "This Sporting Life" is the British entry at Cannes.

Ira H. Tulupan, assistant ad-pub director of Columbia, off on a vacation trip to Italy, Switzerland, France and England . . . Monroe Greenthal agency opening a Coast office with Bernice Livingston in charge, meaning added services for film accounts.

Lenny Lightstone, Embassy Pix exec vp., back in his Gotham office after a visit to the company's Coast operation . . . Leon Fromkess transferred his offices back to Allied Artists from Producers Studio following completion of "Long Corridor" . . . Robert Benson office humming with pre-production work on "Lilith" which rolls in the next few days.

Universal has purchased Jack Bloom's "Under No Flag" and assigned it to Arthur Lewis Jr. for production as the first project under his recently-signed producer pact there. Bloom checks into the studio next week to begin his treatment . . . Martin Levine is chairman of the Twelfth Annual Film Industry Golf Tournament and Funfest, sponsored by N. Y.'s Cinema Lodge of B'nai B'rith, to be held June 13 at Briar Hall Golf and Country Club, Briarcliff, N. Y.

Charles Cohen, Embassy exploitation director, back in New York after meetings with exhibs in Boston planning preem campaigns there for "Long Day's Journey Into Night" and "7 Capital Sins" . . . "Mondo Cane" racking up coast-to-coast bookings . . . Jules Weill, Colorama Features prez, in Gotham from Hollywood after sales and promo confabs on Mickey Spillane's "Girl Killers" . . . producer Richard Bernstein, who recently completed "Gun Hawk" for AA, is planning a filmization of Booth Tarkington's "Penrod and Sam" and has inked Rick Doria to pen a screenplay with him. It'll roll in Hollywood.

George Lefko has been named to handle "Mondo Cane" and other Times Films' releases exclusively in the Milwaukee territory. Pic, incidentally, continues to rack up record-breaking grosses at the Little Carnegie and Forum Theatres, N. Y. . . . 'Long Day's Journey Into Night" will debut in 60 theatres across the country early this month. Joe Levine presentation of Sir London's production will be the inaugural film at the new Kenmore Square Theatre, Boston . . . an evening of films by James Broughton and Sidney Peterson, under the heading "Surrealism and Poetry," was a recent showing at the Museum of Modern Art, N. Y.

RUNAWAYS, PLEASE COME HOME

Hitchy's Homily on Homicide

Hollywood, April 30.

Director Alfred Hitchcock, addressing the audience at UCLA's Samuel Goldwyn Creative Writing Competition awards ceremonies spoke on "Movies and Murder" or, as UCLA Chancellor Franklin D. Murphy said, in introducing him, "the low state of the art and craft of murder." Delivered in his trademarked purkish style, both Hitchy's words and elocution soared.

He opened, "I'm sure you are wondering why I am here speaking of a writing award . . . I, who recently authored that appalling sentence, 'The Birds Is Coming.' I understand it caused as much furor in academic circles as 'Winstons taste good like a cigarette should.' Actually, I suspect it was 'The Birds Is Coming' that inspired my invitation here. You see, these four words demonstrated that I could join Mr. Goldwyn as one of the men who not only produce motion pictures, but enrich the language as well."

He gagged of a class of people who combine both, murder and movies, in a single calling. "I refer, of course, to the critics."

Of his latest release he quipped, "I think it is worth noting that while I replaced many of the actors with birds, I did not replace the writer with one. Perhaps another time."

Continuing, "You understand, I don't really approve of murder. Of course, it is an effective means of resolving human conflicts. But seriously, we must never forget that murder can be a very sordid business—especially if you don't have a good lawyer.

"I am rather dismayed by what is happening to this art, both in fiction and in real life. Like many other institutions, murder is a victim of the 20th century. There are many causes for alarm, but I am particularly concerned with the decline of murder in the home. The murder one reads about today is not committed by a Lizzie Borden engaging in her own version of family fun; instead, we hear of muggings in the park, or killings by hired gangsters in the streets. I find it shocking that people will act this way in public. It is positively indecent. When I was young, respectable people committed murder in private, behind closed doors and among friends."

'Scrubbed Producers Bum-Rap Stars But Not to Their Faces' – Tony Curtis

Hollywood, April 30.

Defending stars, Tony Curtis contends that not only is the star system not dead—it's not even sick. He insists further that the top acting echelon is worth every penny paid in salary and every inch of space awarded thesps in billing. Actor also brands charges that stars are behind much of the runaway production as "so much nonsense."

"Nothing is going to change the star system," says Curtis, insisting that better men have failed in trying to change it than are now—at least vocally—attempting to effect its demise.

Citing examples of several actors prominent in the 30's and 40's who today, "after 25 or 30 years in the business have wound up without a penny" Curtis contends that an actor is justified in getting whatever he can command.

"This idea of 'let's all do it for nothing' is ridiculous. An actor deserves whatever he can get. These are the rules of the game."

He believes that Liz Taylor was justified in asking for $1,000,000

Damian Roca Of Puerto Rico Plots One In English

Damian Roca, president of a Puerto Rican producing company bearing his name, passed through New York over the weekend after conferences in Hollywood concerning his next feature to be made in San Juan, his first with an English soundtrack. Working title is "Viva Puerto Rico."

Roca uses a lot of Mexican talent and prints in Mexico City, where his distributor is Peliculas Nacionales for Mexico and Pelimex for the rest of Latin America. He reports that his films have been financed entirely by native capitalists in San Juan, that his company is one of three producing entities on the island.

Azteca handled his earlier "Romance of Puerto Rico" in the U.S. Spanish lingual situations. He asserts that rentals in the U. S. amounted to $83,000 on a negative investment of $80,000. Feature was directed by a Mexican, Ramon Perreda, and ran one hour and 27 minutes.

Entertainment Law Panel

Hollywood, April 30.

"From Broadway To Hollywood" is title of program for Ninth Annual Entertainment Law Institute to be held May 25 at USC. It will probe legal and business aspects of producing a Broadway play or musical and acquiring motion picture rights. "How To Succeed In Business Without Really Trying" producer Ernest Martin is principal speaker; others will be N.Y. show biz attorneys Irving Cohen and Edward E. Colton.

Program, co-sponsored by the USC Law School and Bev Hills Bar Assn. will also cover Dramatist Guild Agreements, Actors Equity, financing and taxation problems.

'IRMA LA DOUCE' NOT SHOWCASE UNTIL LATER

United Artists, after having earlier considered plans for roadshowing Billy Wilder's "Irma La Douce" in New York, has now decided to release the picture in Gotham on a grind, but extended run policy, thereby holding it out of the Premiere Showcase houses until later in the year.

Picture will open at the DeMille on Broadway and the eastside Baronet June 5. According to UA, the film has been set to play the entire summer at the two theatres.

IF TIDE TURNS WHEN IS IT DUE?

By MIKE FESSIER

Hollywood, April 30.

Despite an abundance of upbeat prognostications and persistent reports that the bloom is off the runaway rose, a check of Hollywood backed films now in production reveals that only 8 of 25 are lensing locally with 10 being filmed entirely overseas. The remainder are currently before either N.Y. or overseas cameras, many of which plan to return for Hollywood interiors although several are slated to go the route in Gotham.

Best available gauge as to how the current situation stacks up with previous years is provided by the Production Code figures. Of 174 features approved by the Code in 1962 only 36 were Hollywood product leased abroad. In 1961 it was 58 overseas American productions out of a 254 Code total. Going back to 1957, it was 47 out of a 378 aggregate. An average of 20% of films screened in the U.S. in any given year receive Code approval. A number approximately equal to American films leased abroad would represent the European films which are released in U.S.

Ratio looms brighter in survey of future films which have been assigned definite start dates, with 8 of a total of 13 slated for 100% Hollywood lensing.

Columbia leads the runaway parade with "Dr. Strangelove: Or How I learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb" in London; "The Cardinal" in Rome pic winds with a fortnight's Hollywood filming after three months in Boston, Vienna and Rome!; "The Long Ships" in Yugoslavia. Studio's "Fail Safe" is shooting in New York, "Under the Yum Yum Tree" it's only pic lensing locally. Studio's "The Three Stooges Go Around the World in a Daze" rolls May 8 here; "Lilith" goes May 15 in Maryland; and "Twenty-Fifth Hour" launches May 20 in the Pyrennes.

Universal's "Dark Purpose" is in Rome; its "Chalk Garden" in London; and its "King of the Mountain" is in France, though slated to return shortly for a lengthy shot of Hollywood interiors. Studio's "Captain Newman M.D." is lensing here as is its "Monsieur Cognac" which will use second unit footage instead of taking principals to France as originally shedded. The Valley lot has no pix with definite future start dates.

MGM has "Of Human Bondage" filming in Ireland and "Sunday in New York" lensing in New York, to return to Hollywood shortly after winding 10 days on the Gotham location. Studio's "Twilight of Honor" rolls tomorrow here.

Paramount has "Love with a Proper Stranger" before the cameras in New York, though film will return for Hollywood interiors. Studio's "Who's Minding the Store?" is currently shooting here. "Becket" goes May 15 for Studio in London and "Seven Days in

'Hollywood's No Ghost Town'; TV's Lear-Yorkin Pair's Baptism Led to Faith in Screen Medium

Rival Arbuckle Biopix

Hollywood, April 30.

Reminiscent of the two British "Oscar Wilde" releases situation, producer Richard Bernstein follows Garrick films with plans for a biopic of late Roscoe "Fatty" Arbuckle, which may indicate either a legal hassle or a race to be first out. Bernstein reported he'll produce "The Fatty Arbuckle Case," based on Leo Guild book, with Allied Artists to release the $600,000-budgetted film shedded to roll in September. He's negotiating with Victor Buono and George C. Scott to play male leads.

Garrick a few days earlier disclosed it had bought Harry Essex's blog, tabbed "Fatty," to be produced on screen after it had played a Broadway engagement. Doubleday will publish Essex's tome in Fall.

CANNES-VIA-TOKYO JAUNT FOR LEVIN

San Francisco, April 30.

Irving M. Levin, director of the San Francisco International Film Festival, flew to Tokyo to attend the Asian Film Festival as an official observer.

One of his purposes, he said before he left, was to meet the major distributors and producers in Tokyo, as well as viewing their most recent product for possible showing here. Sixty-four countries have been invited. There were 36 represented last year. He also planned to continue Westward to attend the Cannes Festival.

Levin said he hopes to set up an International Selection Committee to take over some of the chores connected with picking entries for the Frisco Festival.

Newest category for San Francisco (Oct. 30-November 12) is Film as Art.

Weisbart Back at Fox

Hollywood, April 30.

David Weisbart returns to 20th-Fox on a producer contract. He formerly held a producer berth at studio but left in December, 1960, to move over to Mirisch, where he produced "Follow That Dream" and "Kid Galahad," both Elvis Presley starrers.

While previously with 20th he turned out such productions as "Love Me Tender" and "April Love." He joins William Wyler, Aaron Rosenberg, Martin Melcher and Henry Koster at 20th, already at work on upcoming product under the new Zanuck regime.

Team of writer Norman Lear and director Bud Yorkin, under the aegis of their Tandem Productions, completed their first pic feature, "Come Blow Your Horn." They have been, and are continuing in television, but now with an additional, and heavy, theatrical film schedule.

Tandem's twosome, over lunch at the Oak Room of New York's Hotel Plaza, chorused that their first experience in Hollywood filmmaking has provided them with the conviction "this is an industry of vitality, with more and more excitement being created." Lear asks, "What's so sick about an industry that's spawning so much new talent?"

Whether from tv or elsewhere, the fact remains that many newcomers are entering the theatrical field and creating a stir, said Lear and Yorkin. Cited at random were Ralph Nelson, Blake Edwards, John Frankenheimer, Arnie Sultan, Marvin Worth, Martin Ransahoff, Add Seven Arts and Joe Levine. There are many others—directors, writers and producers, who within a short space of time have made their maiden voyages and bringing in freshness, said Lear.

Individuals, per Lear and Yorkin, never could make so much money as now, and they're not face to face with doors closed to outsiders. Allusion is to the era when just about everyone was either at work under longterm contracts or out of work.

Abecedarian picture makers said they were delighted to learn a few things about (1) Frank Sinatra and (2) how to live by the clock.

They said they heard "rumors that Sinatra might be tough to get along with" and for this reason expected some problems in making "Blow Your Horn" with co-owner-star Sinatra. Well, no problems arose. Sinatra was cooperative, always prepared and on the set at the appointed hour. "There has got to be some give and take with Sinatra, who has a strong mind, but no problems," commented Lear.

As for the time schedule in shooting, this also ties in with Sinatra. Latter insisted on a daily posttime of 11 a.m. which is late in the day by Hollywood standard. "But it's the civilized way of doing things because there are lots of people whose faces don't settle

California View On 'Labelling' Of O'Seas Features

Washington, April 30.

Speaking for California studio crafts, Sen Thomas H Kuchel (R-Calif) has written Treasury Secretary Douglas Dillon protesting the labeling requirements on foreign films brought into the U S Such regulations require only that the country of origin's name be placed on the original box or can in which the film negatives enter the U S

"I believe this is unfair," said Kuchel, "since up to 500 positive prints can be made from this negative and distributed throughout the U S bearing no label whatsoever as to the country of origin."

Imported ash trays, he said, must each bear a label "not merely the box in which perhaps 10,000 of them are imported," he said

Kuchel added

"I have long believed the consuming public should have an opportunity to know where an article was manufactured I would urge that you will be able to reinterpret the existing regulations with reference to films imported into this country so that such information will be available to the consuming public in the various theatres across the land."

Edeline Travels States To Learn How France's Exhibs Can Fight TV

Jean-Charles Edeline, honorary president of the French Federation of Exhibitors, left New York Monday (29) for a swing through the middle west, south and, eventually, Los Angeles, to find out what U.S. exhibs have done and are doing about television competition.

It's Edeline's opinion that French exhibs haven't yet felt the full force of television competition, especially as manifest when feature films start showing up in quantity on the small screen. He reports that his federation is now trying to effect some agreement, to which producers and distribs would also be parties, whereby top pix would be withheld from tv for at least five years.

Since France is still serviced by only one channel, and that government operated, French tv still cannot offer feature film producers very much for tv rights. Thus Edeline envisages some sort of cooperative company, governed by a board repping all branches of the film industry, which would decide which pix might go on tv without having a substantial effect on theatrical b.o., and which pix might better be withheld. In the latter case, the board would ask that it be able to meet or better the tv offer for the pic.

Edeline, who owns 15 theatres in and around Paris, expressed great appreciation for the new arties which he had inspected in New York. Contrary to the experience of most French exhibs, he reported his own biz has been expanding in the last several years. Three principal reasons, he said, were his having theatres located in communities of expanding population, modernization of theatres and higher admission prices.

Exhib winds his cross-country tour in Los Angeles at the end of the week.

55 Days at Peking
(PANAVISION—COLOR)

A substantial entry for the world market although story development short of comfortable with the intense, vivid Peking siege.

Allied Artists release of Samuel Bronston production. Stars Charlton Heston, Ava Gardner, David Niven; features Flora Robson, John Ireland, Harry Andrews, Leo Genn, Kurt Kasznar, Paul Lukas, Lynne Sue Moon. Directed by Nicholas Ray. [illegible] Reviewed April [illegible]. Running time, [illegible] MINS.

Samuel Bronston has a very large production of uncommon visual excitement in "55 Days at Peking." Filmed in 70m Panavision and Technicolor, with director Nicholas Ray uninhibited in his framing of bloody battle, this recounting of a dramatic page in history is another epic in the present run of epics and one that should rate on the list of worldwide commercial successes.

Bronston shows characteristic lavishness in the pictorial scope, the vivid and realistic sets and extras by the thousands in his reproduction of the capital of Imperial China in 1900. The building was in Spain where the company built an entire city. Set and costume designer Veniero Colasanti and John Moore did an exquisite job.

The original screenplay by Philip Yordan and Bernard Gordon presumably adheres to the historical basics in its description of the violent rebellion of the "Boxers" against the major powers of the period — Great Britain, Russia, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, and the United States — because of their commercial exploitation of the tradition-bound and somnolent (backward) China.

These market-seeking nations have in their Peking outpost gallant fighting men who, although only a few hundred in number, withstand the merciless 55-day siege but historic facts must stir some sympathy for the rebels. They fight encroachment by diplomats and soldiers from foreign lands. In short, this was the heyday of the "colonialism" now an issue of sensitivity with Asiatic and African nationals. "55 Days at Peking" takes sides with imperialism and this aspect may prove just a little disconcerting in some playoff markets.

The Yordan-Gordon script, as directed by Ray, succeeds fairly well in incorporating a personalized story within the framework of the vast depiction of primitive, fiery warfare. With Charlton Heston, Ava Gardner and David Niven it plays interestingly but somehow lacks appropriate power. The characterizations don't have the intensity of the struggle.

At the outset film is slow in explaining who's who and motivations for the action. It's not clear as to why an old oriental Christian missionary is brutally pinned to a water wheel and drowned. Filmgoers of today unfamiliar with the Boxer Rebellion might wonder what all these diplomats from around the world are doing under the same roof.

But explanation comes in due time and Ray moves into action. And action it is, including some of the most furious war scenes seen in anybody's picture. Housed in a relatively small compound within Peking are the military men and [illegible] ambassadors and their families. They are threatened with extermination by the Boxers in an early instance of [illegible], go home.

While Nicholas Ray is identified as director of "55 Days of Peking" in [illegible] credits [illegible], some of the [illegible] scenes actually were directed by Andrew Marton. This came to be in a period when Ray was ill, and necessarily out of action. Thus, an important credit for Marton, which should not be overlooked.

Niven is the British embassy head who stubbornly refuses to surrender, risking the safety of all about him, including his wife and two children. He forces the others to join him as a "matter of principle," meaning economic self-interest.

Both Niven and Heston perform with conviction, Heston as the American Marine major who commands the defense. Miss Gardner's role is not too well conceived. Hers is the part of the widow of a Russian baron who, it's conveyed by the dialog, killed himself upon learning of his wife's infidelity with a Chinese official.

Heston and Miss Gardner provide the romance, which develops nicely. In a heroic maneuver, Miss Gardner gets food and supplies into the legation but is wounded in so doing and dies.

Lynne Sue Moon gives a poignant performance as an Oriental 12-year-old whose American father, an Army captain, is killed in battle. Flora Robson appears strikingly authentic as the Dowager Empress Tzu Hsi whose sympathies lie with the rebels. John Ireland is an impressive Yank sergeant. Kurt Kasznar ... [illegible] ... as Miss Gardner's Russian brother-in-law.

Harry Andrews as the French padre, Leo Genn as a Chinese general, Paul Lukas as a German general, and Robert Helpmann, Ichizo Itami, Philip Leroy and Elizabeth Sellars, along with those in lesser parts, are competent contributors.

Jack Hildyard's photography is excellent, particularly in getting on the big screen the savage attacks which take up the major part of the picture. Remarkable effects are achieved such as when the attackers bring up a primitive rocket launcher and send balls of fire into the legation, and when Niven and Heston lead a small group which blows up a Chinese arsenal. What a display of fireworks!

Dimitri Tiomkin provides expert music, mainly noteworthy being the anthems of the military bands of the various nations, at times playing simultaneously and, amusingly, clashing. The general background and "So Little Time" (lyrics by Paul Francis Webster) make for solid accompaniment on their own.

Doug Kingman's water colors, used with the titles, are novel and interesting. Editing for the most part is expert, one reservation being that some tightening in the early reels might have been in order.

"Peking" has a rousing finis, in which the bloodied and near-hopeless Allies are rescued by a long-delayed relief column of warriors and the Boxers are routed. It's a stirring windup, even though suggestive of Crosby's [illegible] rescuing of the Indians in wild west thrillers. Gene.

Klaun Ferdinand A Raketa
(Clown Ferdinand and the Rocket) (CZECH)

Berlin, April 16.

Czech State Film Barrandov production and release. Stars Jiri Vrstala. Directed by Jindrich Polak. Screenplay, [illegible]. [illegible] At Berlin Film Festival, [illegible]. Running time, [illegible] MINS.

Clown Ferdinand is a prominent figure with Czech moppets. He's said to be as popular in this Commie country as Popeye the Sailor was in the U.S. This Czech production has been tailored for the youngsters and may be shown everywhere. It even may have some limited foreign chances.

Plot is simple. A rocket ship of unknown origin is approaching a Czech city. Except for Ferdinand, a vaude clown who lives in a trailer, and three moppets who join him, the inhabitants desert the city. The giant rocket lands on an open field. Somehow Ferdinand and the kids find themselves in the rocket which eventually returns to the air.

Pic has a flavor of naivety but it's pleasant. One feels that its creators have a devotion for kids and human weaknesses, and this is what counts in this one. Jiri Vrstala, who plays Ferdinand, is the star. Director Polak led the three moppets through amiable performances. Outstanding is Jiri Bazant's catchy score with the music played by the Karel Vlach handling behind the scenes and orch, incidentally, the CSSR's best and its most popular band. Technical credits are up to par. Hans.

Lancelot and Guinevere
(Eastman-Color)

Cornel Wilde, Jean Wallace, Brian Aherne in a visit to Camelot, once musicality, but with horse soldiers galore. Lots of King Arthur legendary action in a classily expensive, sometimes exciting but not too skillfully controlled large-screen, Eastman Color production. Needs heavy "sell."

Universal release of Emblem Production, produced by Cornel Wilde and Bernard Luber. Stars Wilde, Jean Wallace, Brian Aherne; features George Baker, Archie Duncan, Adrienne Corri, Michael Meacham, Iain Gregory, Mark Dignam. Directed by Wilde. Screenplay, Richard Schayer and Jefferson Pascal. [illegible] Reviewed April [illegible]. Running time, [illegible] MINS.

King Arthur's beloved wife, Lady Guinevere, smooches up with his favorite knight, Sir Lancelot, and as a result the lady was almost for burning at the stake. This is a key point in this latest version of the much told (with many variations via various media) tale of King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table. It's an elaborately mounted production that generates fair amounts of interest and excitement when the fighting's going on but barely rises above the routine in story-telling the legend.

The Richard Schayer-Jefferson Pascal screenplay is based on Sir Thomas Mallory's "Morte d'Arthur" of the 15th century. It's Cornel Wilde most of the way, he having coproduced with Bernard Luber, directed and costarred with his wife, Jean Wallace, latter making a beautiful Guinevere.

This outing smacks of modernization in terms of plot situation. But not filmmaking technique. King Arthur eagerly awaits his Guinevere at the altar in his Camelot and she's escorted by the gallant Lancelot, Wilde. The marriage takes place, but despite the affection Lancelot feels for his king, he shares a bed with the lady whose name he reduces in the dialog to just plain Guin.

Jousting and open field battling are abundant. There's many a blood-drenched closeup provided by director Wilde and cameraman Harry Waxman. The outdoor scenes, which were filmed in Yugoslavia with native cavalrymen, are in some measure pictorially effective but at times director Wilde is just focusing on so much confused action.

It appears that a bit of the massive battle maneuvers got out of hand. A lack of production discipline also is suggested on several occasions via inadequate bridging, as with one scene going to another without the right kind of segue. No telling how much footage was left on the plains of Titoland or the cutting-room floor of Pinewood Studios, London, where the interiors were lensed. Perhaps there was a post-camerawork decision to drop some gore but in any case the production control was not complete.

But despite the shortcomings, the basic fiction is gotten across all right and thus makes for interest, particularly as enhanced by the Panavision and color values. The "modernization," meaning the sex, so far as the conscientious objectors might be concerned, comes out all right, too. For, the scripters have written in a cinematic act of contrition whereby the adulterous Guin winds up in a nunnery.

An accomplished job is turned in by Brian Aherne, as King Arthur, who's able to give a good reading even when dialog is stilted. Wilde and Miss Wallace are believable. John Longden is properly sinister as Arthur's rival for the crown and Iain Gregory is appealing as a young knight fighting side by side with Lancelot.

Bob Bryan, Andrienne Corri, Michael Meacham and Mark Dignam, in support, lend adequate aid.

Ron Goodwin's music background serves nicely and other technical credits all measure up okay. Gene.

Flipper
(COLOR)

Modest but marketable family-style entry about a boy and a dolphin.

Hollywood, April 16.

Metro release of Ivan Tors production. Stars Chuck Connors; features Luke Halpin. Directed by James B. Clark. Screenplay, Arthur Weiss; from story by Ricou Browning, Jack Cowden. [illegible] Reviewed at [illegible], April [illegible]. Running time, [illegible] MINS.

Boy meets dolphin, boy loses dolphin, boy wins dolphin. Thus substituting gill for gal, producer Ivan Tors, television's underwater answer to Davy Jones, has fashioned a serviceable little "family" picture for Metro that to all intents and purposes, should satisfy youngsters everywhere, although any grown-up who has made the Marineland scene more than once may occasionally be hard put to keep from dropping asleep in the deep.

Actually this little fish story, or Tors opera, amounts to a kind of bubbly variation on "Androcles and the Lion." Arthur Weiss' screenplay, from a story by Ricou Browning and Jack Cowden, has a boy (Luke Halpin) rescuing an eight-foot dolphin from permanent residence in that big fish tank in the sky by removing a skin diver's spear from its torso and nursing it back to health in his dad's Florida Keys fish pen. When dad (Chuck Connors) rationally and purposefully suggests that a fish pen is no place for a mammal, the boy reluctantly stands by as "Flipper" is released into the open sea. But when the loyal, affable dolphin saves the lad from a shark, dad relents and "Flipper" becomes a member of the family.

Connors hams the father firmly but agreeably, and young Halpin, in his screen bow, demonstrates keen acting instincts as the boy on a dolphin. Connie Scott and Kathleen Maguire dispatch important roles capably, and the balance of the cast is reliable.

James B. Clark's resourceful direction is backed up by generally sound production values. Photography by Lamar Boren and Joseph Brun is skillfully performed both above and below sea level, although barnlow footage of the outset has irregularities of color and element. Still, the sequence has good cumulative effect. Warren Adams' editing is taut and trim. Music, always vital in an underwater subject, where bubbles generally are the only sound, has been well handled by composer-conductor Henry Vars. There's also a title song by Vars and Dunham. Tube.

Les Femmes D'Abord
(Ladies First) (FRENCH)

Paris, April 23.

CCFC release of Vega-CFC production. Stars Eddie Constantine; features Christiane Minazzoli, Robert Manuel, Bernadette Lafont, Mischa Auer. Directed by Raoul Andre. Screenplay, Michel Lebrun from book by Paul Gerrardi; camera, Pierre Petit; editor, Gabriel Rongier. At Mercury, Paris. Running time, 90 MINS.

Bobby	Eddie Constantine
Juliette	Christiane Minazzoli
Inspector	Robert Manuel
Stripper	Bernadette Lafont
Count	Mischa Auer
Bobby	Jacques Harden

Eddie Constantine again walks through a gangland adventure as a Yank FBI man. Plenty of fisticuffs, a simple tale and girls make it an acceptable one in its genre with mainly local changes, on the Constantine moniker. It looks to have only dualer chances abroad.

Here Constantine saves a woman in distress and breaks up a dope ring. There are some clever gags and the fights are okay if too openhanded to stand up to the more knuckled Yank counterparts. Direction is competent if lacking punch. Constantine is his usual good-natured, wisecracking superman type. Mosk.

The Day Of The Triffids
(CINEMASCOPE—COLOR)

Exploitable sci-fi meller about a people-eating vegetable.

Hollywood, April 26.

Allied Artists release of George Pitcher production. Stars Howard Keel, Nicole Maurey. Directed by Steve Sekely. Screenplay, Philip Yordan, from the novel by John Wyndham; camera (Eastman), Ted Moore; editor, Spencer Reeves; music, Ron Goodwin. Reviewed at the studio, April [illegible]. Running time, [illegible] MINS.

The triffid is coming. Basically, the George Pitcher production out of England is a vegetarian's version of "The Birds," a science-fiction-horror melodrama about a vile people-eater of the plant kingdom with a voracious appetite. Although riddled with script inconsistencies and irregularities, the Allied Artists release is a more-than-adequate film of its genre and should make a healthy showing in the exploitation-saturation sphere for which it was designed.

John Wyndham's novel, "The Day of the Triffids," served as the source for exec producer Philip Yordan's screenplay. The proceedings begin with a spectacular display of celestial fireworks, a meteoric shower that leaves the earth's population heir to two maladies: blindness and the sinister company of a fast-multiplying plant only called Triffidus Celestus that looks like a Walt Disney nightmare and sounds like a cauldron of broccoli cooking in Margaret Hamilton's witchin' kitchen.

Hero of the piece is Howard Keel as a Yank seaman who, ironically, escaped the eclipse of blindness by having had his ill optics bandaged during the meteoric interim, makes his way through a world helplessly engaged in a universal game of blind man's buff while under mortal threat of the carnivorous chlorophyll. Ultimately a marine biologist (Kieron Moore) stranded in a lighthouse with his wife (Janette Scott) discovers the means to dissolve and destroy the triffid: simple sea water. Man, blindness, however, persists at the end, leaving the picture somewhat inconclusive.

The acting is generally capable. In addition to Keel, Moore and Miss Scott, those playing prominent roles are Nicole Maurey, Mervyn Johns and young Janina Faye.

Steve Sekely's otherwise able direction has a bothersome flaw in the contradictory manner in which the triffids seem to approach and assault their victims. Ted Moore's camera-work is effective, and Wally Veevers' special effects photography is a vital and skillfully-executed contribution. The drama tends to lurch here and there, but on the whole Spencer Reeves has done a trim and tidy job of editing. Sound by Bert Ross and Maurice Askew is acutely sensitive in capturing the oddly alternating creak, crawl, hiss, snap, crackle and pop of the triffids. Ron Goodwin's music adheres to generally standard horror moods and patterns. Tube.

KENNEDYS OR THEIR CHECKS EXPECTED: PAT

Hollywood, April 30.

Warner Bros. will Coast-preem its "P T 109," based on Naval activities of President John F. Kennedy during World War II, as a $100-a-seat benefit for the Joseph P. Kennedy Jr. Child Study Center, Santa Monica. Event, to be held July 2 at International Ballroom of the Beverly Hilton Hotel, is expected to raise $100,000. Ducat price includes dinner and preview, first time such a showing has been held in this fashion.

Mrs. Peter Lawford, who will chair benefit, reported that invitations have already gone out to her brothers in Washington but she doesn't know now whether they'll be able to attend. Pat added "However, I'm waiting for their checks."

Center basically is a research base for causes of mental retardation.

New Films Lift L.A.; 'Gypsy' Finishy $27,000, 'Balcony' Brisk 13G, 'Birdie' Lofty 23G; 'Ugly' Lively 16G, 4th

Los Angeles, April 30.

Local firstruns are holding up firmly this stanza with return of "Gypsy" in first general run to spark overall outlook. Playing in four spots, it looks like dandy $27,000 on week. Four other openers are not doing so well. "Man From Diners' Club" is after fair $16,000 in four theatres.

"The Balcony," however, shapes lofty $13,500 in two locations. "The Trial" looms soft $9,200 in two houses. "Wrong Arm of Law" looks okay $5,500 at Music Hall.

"How West Was Won" still packs up strongly with $28,000 for 16th Warner Hollywood stanza. "Bye Bye Birdie" should do hefty $23,000 in fourth at Hollywood Pal. "The Birds" looks lofty $17,000 in third week in three spots.

"Ugly American" shapes hefty $16,000 in fourth Pantages week. "To Kill a Mockingbird" looms about $13,000 or over in 10th round at Fox Wilshire in 12th week.

Estimates for This Week

Music Hall (Sno) (700; $2-$1.50) "Wrong Arm of Law" (Cont). Okay $5,500. Last week, "Long Day's Journey Into Night" (Embs) (4th wk-4 days), $2,000.

'Loves' Sad $5,000 In Cleve.; 'West' Lusty 13G

Cleveland, April 30.

Newcomers are proving little help to general boxoffice pictures here currently. "My Six Loves," one of newies, shapes sad at State. "How West Was Won" is doing extra well in third round at Palace. "David and Lisa" looks nice daydating two arty theatres in eighth round. "To Kill a Mockingbird" still is fancy in fifth session at the Allen.

Estimates for This week

Allen (Stanley-Warner) (2,806; $1.50)—"To Kill Mockingbird" (U) (5th wk). Fast $9,000. Last week, $13,000.

Colony Art (S-W) (1,364; $1.50)—"Long Day's Journey Into Night" (Layline) (2d wk). Good $4,500. Last week, $5,000.

Continental Art (Art Theatre Guild) (625; $1.50)—"Love and Larceny" (Indie). Average $2,100. Last week, "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Indie) and "Great Chase" (Indie), $1,900.

Heights Art (Art Theatre Guild) (625; $1.50)—"David and Lisa" (Cont) (6th wk). Nice $2,300. Last week, $2,000.

Hippodrome (Eastern Hipp) (3,500; $1.25-$1.50)—"The Birds" (U) (2d wk). Okay $9,000 in 9 days. Last week, $12,000.

Ohio (Loew) (2,700; $1.25-$1.50)—"Miracle of White Stallions" (BV) (2d wk). Okay $4,000. Last week, $5,000.

Palace (F & A Theatre) (3,263; $1.25-$2.75) — "How West Was Won" (MGM) (2d wk). Extra good $13,000 or better. Last week, $17,000.

Business at most Broadway deluxers is on the skids in current round despite some new product. The fact that the weekend was an ideal one for outdoors activity, and this is a post-holiday week is cutting deeply on the overall total. While Wednesday's boxoffice generally was strong, it tapered rather abruptly the next two days, with Saturday about normal. But Sunday saw too many folks just parading or seeking outdoor recreation.

"Love Is a Ball" is top newcomer, with a solid $27,000 for initial week, daydating the Astor and Trans-Lux 85th St. "Magnificent Sinner" shapes only slim $6,000 in first session at the Victoria. "The Law" hit an excellent $20,000 daydating the Embassy and Murray Hill in first stanza. Pic started its second week Monday.

Big news continues to be the Music Hall, where "Bye Bye Birdie" and Easter stageshow looks to hold at wham $170,000 or better in fourth session. Goes a fifth, of course. The fact that the film's running time is only one hour and 51 minutes is making for fast turnover, highly desirable for an Easter pic, with its long lines.

"Mondo Cane" held with socko $23,000 in fourth round, daydating the Forum and Little Carnegie. "The Birds" looks like big $26,000 in fifth week, daydating the Palace and Sutton.

"Ugly American" continues hoff with $42,000 likely in third stanza, daydating the Rivoli and Trans-Lux East.

All hardticketers are down considerably from the booming holiday week. Best showings are being made by "How West Was Won," with virtual capacity $43,000 for 14 shows in fifth round at the Cinerama, and "Lawrence of Arabia," also very close in absolute capacity at $43,500 in 19th session at the Criterion. It's for 10 performances.

Estimates for This Week

Astor (City Inv.) (1,094; $1.25-$2)—Love Is a Ball" (UA) (2d wk). Initial round finished yesterday (Tues.) hit a solid $18,000 or close.

Cinerama (Loew) (1,552; $1.50-$3.50)—"How West Was Won" (MGM) (6th wk). Fifth week completed Sunday (28) was nearly capacity $43,000 for 14 performances after $77,500 on 20 shows in fourth session. Fourth week also had holiday scales.

Criterion (Moss) (1,530; $1.50-$4.50)—"Lawrence of Arabia" (Col) (20th wk). The 19th stanza ended Sunday (28) was practically capacity at $43,500 for 10 performances after $42,000 on 14 shows in 18th week.

DeMille (Reade) (1463; $1.50-$2.50)—"Lafayette" (4th wk). Third round ended yesterday (Tues.) slipped to mild $10,500. Second was $15,000, below expectancy. Stays, but not much longer.

Embassy (Guild Enterprises) (500; $1.50-$2.50)—"The Law" (Embassy) (2d wk). First week concluded Sunday (28) was excellent $11,000.

Palace (RKO) 1,642; $1.50-$2.50)—"The Birds" (U) (5th wk). Present round ending today (Wed.) is heading for great $19,000 or over after $26,000 for fourth week.

Forum (Norel) (813; $1.25-$1.80)—"Mondo Cane" (Times) (5th wk). Fourth session finished yesterday (Tues.) was socko $14,000 or near after $17,000 for third week.

Paramount (AB-PT) (3,665; $1-$2—"Come Fly With Me" (MGM). Opens today (Wed.). In ahead, "My Six Loves" (Par) (4th wk), was slight $13,000 or less after $22,000 for third week.

Radio City Music Hall (Rockefellers) (6,200; $0-$2.75)—"Bye Bye Birdie" (Col) and Easter stageshow (4th wk). Current stanza ending today (Wed.) looks to hold with wham $170,000 or near after $210,-678 for third week over estimate. First three weeks hit new alltime high here of $641,689. Holds a fifth session, with a sixth or seventh a possibility.

Rivoli (UAT) (1,545; $1.50-$2.50)—"Ugly American" (U) (3d wk). This frame finishing today (Wed.) looks like great $27,000 or close after $30,000 for second week. Continues on. Daydating with Trans-Lux East.

State (Loew) (1,850; $1.50-$3.50)—"Mutiny on Bounty" (MGM) (24th wk). Current week winding tomorrow (Thurs.) looks to hit solid $26,000 for 10 shows. The 23d week was $28,000 for same number of performances. The current week's figure is a low for the engagement. Set to stay through the summer.

Victoria (City Inv.) (1,003; $1.25-$2)—"Magnificent Sinner" (Indie) (2d wk). Opening session hit slim $6,000 or close. In ahead, "Courtship of Eddie's Father" (MGM) (4th wk), $16,000.

Warner (SW) (1,813; $1.50-$3.50)—"Longest Day" (20th) (30th wk). This stanza ending tomorrow (Thurs.) looks like great $22,000 or near after $24,000 in 29th week on 11 shows.

First-Run Arties

New Baronet (Reade) (450; $1.25-$2)—"Balcony" (Cont) (6th wk). This week ending today (Wed.) is heading for good $6,000 after $8,000 in fifth. "Your Shadow Is Mine" (Cont) is due May 13.

Coronet (Reade) (500; $1.50-$2)—"Wrong Arm of Law" (Cont) (5th wk). Fourth round finished Monday (29) was big $9,500 after $11,500 for third week.

Fine Arts (Davis) (468; $1.50-$2)—"Sundays and Cybele" (Davis) (25th wk). The 24th stanza completed Sunday (28) was big $5,900 after $9,300 for 23d week.

Beekman (Rugoff Th.) (500; $1.50-$2)—"Four Days of Naples" (MGM) (7th wk). Sixth week finished yesterday (Tues.) was good $6,000 or near after $8,000 for fifth session.

DIG NO DOWNTOWN GRAVES

Income Tax & Rich Ancestors

By ROBERT J. LANDRY

Income tax today is the pervasive iceberg underlying all private enterprise. The sharply rising rates constitute the phantom partnership in every buying, selling or merging decision in American business. Income tax touches everybody and everything. It is the most threateningly lethal force after the atomic bomb, and to a considerable extent it is the child and servant of the bomb. Anybody attempting to beat the U.S. income tax system is relentlessly hounded down, unsentimentally prosecuted and taken, handcuffed, to the Federal lockup to reflect, at leisure, upon his idiocy.

All of these truisms are set forth in clear, documented detail by a new Prentice-Hall volume, "The American Way in Taxation," credited to Lillian Doris as "editor" rather than writer. It is a textbook for every business library and for the responsible executives of every business. But beyond that, this is a handy reference for all who comment upon the American commercial scene.

The book is, in its method of organization and in the tone of its emphasis, the Government's own viewpoint on the tax and the administration problems. Included, for instance, is a chapter setting forth career opportunities within the Internal Revenue hierarchy.

Plainly the collection of income tax has been progressively tightened since the scandals which broke while Truman was President but which had been maturing for years. The picture of present efficiency is certainly impressive, though many citizens may still feel that the salaried man never enjoys the advantages which the law provides the enterpriser. One must have large income, variable sources, and seven of offset and legal deduction first. The trick of course is to get into oil, gas, citrus, beef, and such allowance-happy enterprises. A rich grandfather is nearly indispensable.

U.S. income tax, originated during the Civil War, was repealed in 1872. Repeated efforts to reenact it were defeated, finally, by the U.S. Supreme Court, which declared it unconstitutional. Hence after 1880 there was a pulling of the states, a constitutional amendment was finally ratified and constitutional income tax then began. It was not supposed at that period of innocence that it would rise, much above 6% in normal times. The Civil War tax had been 10% on incomes exceeding $10,000 annually.

From the repository of data in this fact-and-chart-packed book we learn that the Federal tax collection of 1962 was $99,169,000. In 1913, at the outset of the present law, the collections amounted to $344,000,000. Note that these are simple, oldfashioned millions. The estimated take of the U.S. Treasury in 1963 will be, in billions, well over $168,119,000,000.

For further perspective on Federal tax collections the volume gives this comparative more for 1962:

Income Tax	$71.9	billions
Excise Tax	12.8	"
Estate & Gift Taxes	2.0	"
Employment Taxes	12.7	"
Old Age Taxes	8.0	"

Can 'Churchill' Rate Eady Subsidy?

20th Talks Deal With Le Vien — Usually Only 10% Of Footage May Be Vintage

Talks are now going on between 20th-Fox and Jack Le Vien, executive producer of this year's Oscar-winning documentary feature, "The Black Fox," on an agreement for 20th to handle worldwide theatrical and tv rights to two upcoming Le Vien fact features — "The Winston Churchill Story" and "The Duke of Windsor Story," both tentative titles.

Playing a key role in the success of the negotiations will be Le Vien's ability to persuade Britain's Eady authorities to allow the Churchill film to qualify for subsidy money. Problem arises from the fact that under existing Eady statutes, a picture cannot qualify if more than 10% of the completed picture is made up of previously existing footage. Le Vien estimates that "Churchill" will utilize up to 30%, with the balance been made up of new footage to be shot as interviews with people who knew Churchill or were affected by his life.

Victor Wolfson is now working on the Churchill script, which Le Vien has budgeted at $400,000, a whopping ambient for a docu feature. Plans are to put the feature together in Britain if he gets an Eady okay. Otherwise, he'll do it here.

Le Vien, whose association with Churchilliana was launched with the tv series, "The Valiant Years," won't divulge terms of the former British prime minister's participation in the film, except to say it's a royalty agreement and the same as was in effect on the tv series. It's understood Churchill has already noted in the area of $600,000 from the tv pix.

Le Vien is not apprehensive about competition with Paramount's projected film about Churchill's early years, since that will be in the form of a fiction film. If all goes according to shed, producer hopes to finish his documentary before the end of next winter. After that, he'll turn to the Windsor opus, which will be done entirely from existing footage, dealing with the former Edward VIII only up until the time of his abdication, when he became the Duke of Windsor. Meanwhile, Le Vien is putting together a series of 26 half-hour tv films on the monarchies of the world.

Re "The Black Fox," which premeres in New York shortly, Le Vien has every expectation on making a profit on the pic's $140,000 budget. The picture, which was produced, written and directed by Louis Clyde Stoumen, has already recouped about half its budget from advances for the rights to Europe, Japan, and the North and South American markets. Arthur Rankoff's Heritage International has the U. S. rights, with pic being distributed by Harold Wirtschafter's Caprl Films.

Kansas Demands Track Cuts From O'Neill Film; Ephraim London: 'Never!'

Kansas State Board of Review has refused to issue a license to film version of Eugene O'Neill's "Long Day's Journey Into Night," which Sly Landau produced, unless certain deletions are made. Deletions all concern dialog, including "bastards," "whore," and "God damn it."

Attorney Ephraim London, who is handling the case for distrib Embassy Pictures, charges that all of the "objectionable" words and phrases have occured at one time or another in pictures previously passed by the Kansas group. He says Embassy Pictures has no intention of cutting anything from the O'Neill picture.

PRAUGHT CITES VALUE TO TRADE

By FRED TEW

Detroit, April 30.

A strong defense for downtown showcasing of films, while simultaneously recognizing the need for sub-run presentations of top releases in a limited number of deluxe suburban theatres, was offered in a statement concerning the "changing pattern of the releasing of films in Detroit," by Woodrow R. Praught, prexy of United Detroit Theatres.

Acknowledging that an "overabundance" of family-type and action-type films to be released this summer has resulted in the booking of many of them on a multiple first run basis in subs houses, bypassing downtown showcase engagements, he said that "the majority of top-quality motion pictures will continue to be booked first on an exclusive basis in the deluxe downtown movie houses."

Praught's UDT chain includes four downtown first-run theatres and six of the leading suburban and subs houses. Citing the current crop of outstanding films now grossing big coin downtown—"Lawrence of Arabia," "The Birds," "How the West Was Won," "Mutiny on the Bounty," "Miracle of the White Stallions," and "Come Fly with Me"—Praught said:

"The cumulative cost of these films is almost incalculable, and their cumulative value to the vitality of the heart of the city is just about as incalculable. These are the films that draw people from faraway places into the heart of downtown. They are an important part of the excitement of being downtown, daytime or nighttime. They are part of what makes a visit to the heart of a great city exciting."

Discriminating

Praught added: "Audiences have become more discriminating, but will turn out in record numbers for something that happens to strike their fancy. As a result, many of the films that meet downtown standards play longer engagements than was formerly true. Thus only a limited number can be accommodated in the first-run showcases, and in a period of over-abundance the distributors of films find it expedient to go directly to the neighborhoods for the first releases of certain films—a logical develop-

CONGRESS OF EXHIBS NOW LACKS OFFICE

Anyone trying to get in touch with the American Congress of Exhibitors by conventional means would be in for a bit of a problem these days. The organization isn't listed in the phone book any more and, if one calls its old number, he gets an entirely unrelated firm.

What has happened, according to Emanuel Frisch, C. of E. prez, is not that the organization has folded but that it is moving overhead by not operating an office of its own. There is still a board and officers, he says, but they only convene when a matter requiring their attention comes up. There is no more full-time staff or anything like that.

Ace Films, a production outgrowth of C. of E., of course is continuing to function and has money and projects going with Allied Artists at present. But it has separate offices and has its own officers with Sidney Markley as prez.

There's nothing really pressing enough to keep the C. of E. office in constant operation, apparently. Frisch says that the organization is continuing to carry on whatever business it has before it. Only major thing that may be coming up in the near future, he feels, is some discussion on the recent talks being conducted by Theatre Owners of America and Allied States Assn. with major distribs about various industry problems from tv sale to release patterns.

MIRISCH TALENT DEALS

Set with Jewison and Neame for Future UA Product

Mirisch, which last week contracted George Axelrod as a producer-writer, this week signed two separate two-picture deals with U.S. director Norman Jewison and British director Ronald Neame. All Mirisch product now goes out via United Artists.

Neame's first project, as yet unset, is expected to get underway later this year. Jewison's first also is not set, but its start will wait until he finishes his first Broadway play, Meredith Wilson's "Here's Love," based on the film, "Miracle on 34th Street."

Defense Co-Op Rules Tentative; Showmen Study

Washington, April 30.

Proposed new Defense Dept. regulations governing cooperation by the military services with theatrical screen and television home screen film producers have been turned over, with requests for comment, to the Motion Picture Assn., the Screen Producers Guild and the Society of Independent Motion Picture Producers.

Other independents not reached can see the draft of the regulations upon request, Donald Baruch, head of the Pentagon's Audio-Visual Division, indicated.

No final decision on altering the regulations, last changed in 1954, will be made until the comments of the industry have been studied, according to present plans. The Assistant Secretary of Public Affairs, Arthur Sylvester, will make the final judgment on the regulations.

Text of the regulations will not be made public until the language is finalized. However, it was reliably learned that the most significant change in policy involves stripping military officers in the field at the scene of the filming of the wide discretion they have had.

Instead, there will be considerably more control from the Pentagon itself. All the specifics, including a daily shooting schedule in complete detail, would have to be furnished to Washington.

Mad for Bad Money in Extras Guild Coffers; Voting Now Climaxing

Hollywood, April 30.

Charges and counter-charges were being tossed around with here as the Screen Extras Guild election campaign neared its end. Balloting winds today (April 30). An indie slate headed by Tony Regan, incumbent board member, is seeking to unseat an administration ticket headed by prexy Jeffrey Sayre.

Regan charged that Guild has collected over $800,000 since 1960 for contract violations from producers, and that the membership has been denied any voice in the disposition of the coin. He said SEG says Taft-Hartley bans distribution of such monies to members, and thus justifies its going into the guild's general fund. Regan sharply challenged the guild contention.

Sayre refuted Regan's claim, saying "there have been many, many legal decisions that this money cannot be distributed to members." He explained this does not imply to individuals' claims, that coin collected for such violations does go to the members involved. Coin collected for general contract violations go into the guild's fund, not to individuals. "More than "Films are the only creative medium today," is the opinion of Peter Tewksbury, tv-legit director who is making his film directorial bow with the currently-leasing Seven Arts-Metro "Sunday in New York." "Tv is rapidly going downhill and theatre is as shoddy as can be imagined," he contends, but films are not without their problems either, particularly in the field of comedy.

"There's still a hangover from the heavy-handed techniques of the 1930s and 40s, particularly in comedy and noticably in the availability of comedy actors. The trouble is there's no second string to take over for the comedic talents of a Cary Grant. It's one of the great sadnesses of the film industry that they're not building talent today," he avers.

"It's an immense problem to find people to fit into leading roles who have a proper image for boxoffice value and who can also translate to the screen what a director is trying to do." This is particularly true in the field of comedy, Tewksbury feels, noting that he is using virtually untried (from a feature standpoint) comedic talents in "Sunday" in the persons of Cliff Robertson, Jane Fonda and Rod Taylor. Noting that he believes in their comedy thespic abilities, he also points out that their names haven't really developed into top b.o. draws yet.

He feels this is a particular problem for Hollywood and says that it may be a contributing factor to why there is such an emphasis on dramatic films. The big comedic stars like a Grant are now in a price orbit that excludes a medium-priced picture like "Sunday" and there's no "second string," as he puts it, to fill the void for a modestly-budgeted comedy like this one.

"You have a much better chance with drama today," Tewksbury feels, "because you have better actors. There's been a great slippage in comedies in the past 15 years. Comedy does not seem to have rubbed off on this country. Comedy of comment is an area that is vastly neglected," he contends, noting that "many of the

First Newly-Built Stand In 30 Years; Boston's Kenmore's O'Neill Start

Boston, April 30.

Boston is to have another new theatre. This one, the first actually built in 30 years in the city, will be called the Kenmore Square Cinema. A May 1 opening is hoped for; an opening film has already been set, Sly Landau's "Long Day's Journey Into Night" by Eugene O'Neill.

The new theatre is being built in the Cities Service Bldg. at Kenmore Square and its marquee will jut over what was formerly a gasoline station. Although several theatres have been proposed for the Kenmore Square area, this is the first one to come through.

The Kenmore Square area has no theatre now. Louis Richmond's Kenmore was torn down last June to make way for the new toll road into downtown Boston.

The new house will seat 652. Operators are Steve Minasian, president; Philip J. Scuderi, treasurer; Robert Barsamian, vice-president.

They operate the following Massachusetts drive-ins: Route 114, Middleton; Blue Hills, Canton; Plainville, N. H. Drive-In; Meadowbrook, Middleboro; Oxford Drive-In Theatre, Oxford, and North Reading Drive-In, North Reading. Two more hardtops besides the new one they are opening in Boston are planned in Lawrence and Brockton.

The new Kenmore Square Cinema will have an art gallery, an intimate lounge for free coffee, magazines and newspapers from the U.S. and foreign countries; abstract wall murals, and push-back seats.

Hall Bartlett, having recently completed "The Caretakers", now focuses his producing talents on a rollicking, riotous comedy about the United Nations, "A GLOBAL AFFAIR";* starring Bob Hope...in association with Seven Arts.

Melvin Gold's New Mesal Productions

Teams With Sally Perle and E. A. Steler—Will Produce 'Not for Love' First

Melvin L. Gold, prez of a commercial-trailer production-consultant firm, Melvin L. Gold Enterprises, has formed a feature-tv film production company called Mesal Productions, headquartering in New York. Officers of the Corp. are Gold as prez, Sally Perle as v.p.-secretary and Elias A. Steler, treasurer.

First project planned for the new outfit will be the filmization of "Not For Love" which Gold has adopted from Virginia McManus' novel. Pic is slated to roll within the next few months in New York on an estimated budget of $300,000. Another property slated for production is a film version of Douglas Fields Bailey's book "Devil Make A Third." This latter will be budgeted in excess of $1,000,000.

Gold and Miss Perle will coproduce "Not For Love" for which financing is currently being arranged. Also under consideration is another pic project, a tv spectacular and two properties for Broadway. All of these projects are based on properties already controlled by Mesal.

Gold's activities in the film biz have spanned the past 34 years during which time he's been associated with National Screen Service, the National Television Film Council, Associated Motion Picture Advertisers and various enterprises of his own, among them Mel Gold Productions which produced commercials, industrial films and tv series like the Paul Winchell Show. Miss Perle is prez of Central Casting Corp., large Gotham casting agency and Steler heads an accounting firm which bears his name.

Downpour of Scrolls For Par's Y. Frank Freeman At Bevhilton Tribute

Hollywood, April 30.

President John F. Kennedy last night headed an impressive list of national, civic, film industry and social figures in paying tribute to Y. Frank Freeman. More than 1,200 coworkers from the film industry and the various philanthropic organizations in which Freeman has been engaged, gathered at the Beverly Hilton. Some 23 plaques, scrolls and citations were presented to Freeman.

Jack L. Warner read a resolution, which cited Freeman as one of the AMPP's "most distinguished and beloved members."

Samuel Goldwyn declared he knew none in "our entire community more deserving of the love and respect and admiration we all have for him than Frank Freeman." Goldwyn called him "scrupulously fair."

Barney Balaban, president of Paramount Pictures Corp., of which Freeman is vice-president, spoke of the exec's "unparalleled contribution to the stature of the organization throughout his 30 years association."

Other citations, including a plaque presented by IATSE international president Richard F. Walsh which thanked Freeman for his "understanding in dealing with members of all local unions employed within the Hollywood studios."

Entertainment was provided by emcee Bob Hope, his usual ad-libs both topical and entertaining; Jerry Lewis, Edie Adams, Jane Powell and the Nelson Riddle orchestra. Dais, aside from speakers, included Dr. Raymond Lindquist, Charlton Heston, Norman Chandler, Edmund L. DePatie (general chairman of the dinner) Mrs. Freeman, Adolph Zukor, Conrad Hilton, Eddie Mannix, Charles Boren, Dr. Norman Topping, Willard Keith, James R. Webb, Abe Lastfogel, Leo Jaffe, Roy Disney, Loretta Young, Francis Cardinal McIntyre, Dr. Forrest Weir, James Stewart, Robert O'Brien, Jack Karp, Lew Wasserman, George Chandler, Walter M. Mirisch, Leonard Goldenson, Spyros Skouras and Steve Broidy.

Arter-in-Shopper

Detroit, April 30.

A new, first-run art house, seating 600, will be constructed near Northland Center, which is billed as the nation's largest shopping centre.

Ross Cacavale, general manager of Studio Theatres Corp., which operates the Arties, Studio and Studio North, revealed the deal.

'3d Secret' Off Landau's Slate; Why?—A Secret

A deal whereby Ely Landau was to have purchased Bob Joseph's "Third Secret" for July production has fallen through. Legal problems, not identified, have been given as the reason for the deal's collapse but, according to the William Morris Agency, which handles the property, other talks are in progress, presumably with another producer.

Script has had something of a roundabout history, Landau being the second producer to have had and then lost the property. "Secret" was originally to have been bought by the now-defunct Entertainment Corp. of America. When ECA folded, Joseph recaptured his property from the outfit and Landau later made a deal to buy it from him for his own production. It was to have rolled July 1 in New York with Charles Crichton, British director who was to have loaned it for ECA in England, coming to the States to meg it for Landau.

Without "Secret," Landau still has five projects set to roll this year, three of which go in the east between May 13 and Aug. 1. They're "Fool Killer," starting May 13 in Knoxville, Tenn.; "Pawnbroker," going June 15 in New York and "Forbidden Area," rolling Aug. 1 in Washington and Gotham. Also on his slate, Landau has "Madwoman of Chaillot" for an October start in Paris and "Leonardo da Vinci" to begin in Rome in November.

Landau has also gone into New York exhibition with the purchase of two 57th St. houses, the Little Carnegie and Trans-Lux Normandie, to be operated as twin cinemas, opening in July.

New York Directors At Standoff With Makers; Negotiators Still Meet

Screen Directors International Guild last week obtained authorization from its membership to call a strike against members of the Film Producers Assn. should current contract talks between the two bog down further into collapse.

Guild has virtually stood pat on its original demands. FPA, which reps a majority of Gotham producers, mostly commercial, has consistently rejected these demands and has made its own package offer which the directors call unacceptable.

A meeting was held between two, two days following the membership's strike authorization. Again, no progress. FPA held a board meeting in interim last night (Tues.) and is meeting Directors rep today. It would be the first actual strike by the Guild which has threatened them before.

At stake are demands for establishment of preparation time payment for directors, increased overtime pay, clarification of staff director status, percentage scale increases and upped benefits for Saturday, Sunday and holiday work. Mostly affected by a strike, should one be called, would be tv commercial production, over 75% of which is lensed in New York.

George Glass With Rebson

Hollywood, April 30.

He'll function in management duties on pix out by Robson for Red Lion, and also work on worldwide publicity and merchandising.

Who Ought Go To Film Festivals?

Berkeley, Calif.

Editor, VARIETY:

Since my name came into Ehrmann's story about Mar Del Plata (in your April 3 issue) I'd like to make a couple of observations.

First, a properly conducted festival is not just a business jamboree, but an occasion to inspect, discuss and possibly celebrate the latest creative efforts of film-makers. Festivals ought therefore to be attended by more than vaguely interested tourists or selfishly interested promoters. It ought to be possible for film people to get to festivals as scientists get to conferences and conventions. For the scientists this comes out of the ABC or the National Science Foundation. How can we get something similar going for films?

Second, the rationale for inviting distant guests at a festival's own expense is especially shaky in the case of journalists, who ought to feel free to knock anything or anybody. In my case, I was invited to go to Mar Del Plata at festival expense, and would cheerfully have gone if the arrangements had not mysteriously fallen through. (Letters, wires, and a telephone call to Buenos Aires availed nothing. So I am hardly a "no-show" in Ehrmann's phrase, and remain unimpressed with the Argentines' organization). But this is clearly not a good arrangement. And of course if most Americans there go under these or other haphazard arrangements, it is all too true that "the Yanks have no money" for festival party-throwing, etc.

Third, if the U.S. industry really thinks the Latin American market matters, they and the USIA ought to get organized now for the Acapulco festival. A delegation at least as sensible as those the Russians have been sending to San Francisco ought to be assembled, and sent under some kind of official auspices. As a first approximation, I'd suggest it should include one established Hollywood director, one young Hollywood director, one New York director, and one documentary or short-film maker, plus one gorgeous doll who has something to do with a picture entered. . . .

Boren, Somerset Meeting Weaver

Hollywood, April 30.

Hollywood's Joint Labor-Management Committee on Foreign Film Production lead by Charles Boren of Assn. of Motion Picture Producers and Pat Somerset of Screen Actors Guild will meet with Asst. Secretary of Labor George Weaver May 14 in Washington to discuss the deluge of Hollywood suggestions which the Dept. of Labor has received anent ways of combating "runaway."

Meeting apparently freezes out Don Haggerty's dissident "Committee to Promote American Made Motion Pictures" which has sought a similar huddle with Weaver.

Al Sherman Consultancy

Al Sherman has exited as managing director of the Baronet and Coronet, Walter Reade-Sterling art houses on Manhattan's east side, to open his own office as a consultant on presentation, programming and promotion for both exhibitors and distributors in the art cinema field.

Sherman has background in public relations, film promotion and newspaper work.

Beef-Up of Paramount Features; 'Days in May' Token of Attitude

Rocky Mountain Clinic

Rocky Mountain Motion Picture Assn., formed last fall and comprised of film industry people throughout the Rocky Mt. area, is set with its first business meeting May 16 in Denver.

It's to be a one-day "clinic" titled "The Forward Look—1963-1964" and will feature film and theatre execs in discussions of various subjects.

Among those on the program are James Velde, United Artists domestic distribution v.p.; N. B. Smith, ad director of Commonwealth Theatres, Kansas City; Paul Lyday, National General publicity exec, and Barry Lorie of Lorie-Lotito Productions, Denver.

Broadway Click Escalated 'Horn' Rights to 250G

Paramount, as financier-distributor of "Come Blow Your Horn," Essex-Tandem production, bought the rights to the Neil Simon legiter when it was playing pre-Broadway in Bucks County at a minimum price of $75,000, which was to scale upward commensurate with the length of the run on Broadway. Deal was entered when the comedy was titled "One Shoe Off."

The Michael Ellis-Bill Hammerstein legit production, as directed by Stanley Prager, proved successful in Gotham and Par had to ante up maximum price under the escalator arrangement. This came to $250,000.

The Bud Yorkin-Norman Lear film production had been budgeted at $3,100,000 with a shooting schedule of eight weeks at the studio and three days in N. Y. The tyro filmmakers brought the Frank Sinatra starrer six days under schedule and this cut the budget by $200,000.

Cameramen's Union Raps 'Fly-By-Night' (Cheaper) Defense Film Makers

Hollywood, April 30.

Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara was urged to return production of hundreds of films made for the Defense Dept. to Hollywood on grounds most such films are now made by "fly by night" producers who can't deliver the quality Hollywood producers can. Pitch was made in a letter to Secretary McNamara by Herbert Aller, biz rep of IATSE cameraman's local 659.

Aller told McNamara Hollywood producers would welcome a meeting with a rep of the Secretary of Defense, to discuss the situation.

Films referred to are made for the U.S. armed forces, and are for non-commercial use, dealing with the techniques of warfare, training of manpower and other phases of military and civilian life pertaining to the defense of the U.S.

Aller wrote, "the production of many of these films have been allocated to producers who, in no way, have the facilities and the competency of the recognized and established motion picture producers in this area. Moreover, the great majority of the films that have been made in no way measure up to the standards which have appeared in films of a similar feature which were for years made in this area."

Aller said producers here told him they can't compete with low bids by 'fly by night' non-Hollywood producers. Observing the Secretary had stated bids should be made on the basis of quality rather thn the fact they are the lowest bids, Aller urged him to apply this principle to letting of contracts for production of the Defense Dept. films.

By GENE ARNEEL

Paramount is thinking, and spending, bigger in terms of production as well as of marketing, George Weltner, exec v.p., said in effect last week.

Weltner said he's especially high on the deal he recently closed for "Seven Days in May," which joins Burt Lancaster, Kirk Douglas and Frederic March in the cast, director John Frankenheimer, producer Edward Lewis and writer Rod Serling. In a kind of splurge that's rare at Par, the company is taking full-page ads in tradepapers and consumer press around the world seven months in advance of release of "Seven Days" urging the public to "count the days" before the film arrives.

Elaborate advance campaign started with a full pager in New York Times Friday (26), goes also in Los Angeles, London, Paris, Rome, Frankfurt, Sydney and Tokyo.

Weltner recalled that Par has had its share of important features in past "but I doubt if any have ever been greater or more important than those that will be born out of Paramount's new production program."

It was this official who sewed up the contract for "Seven Days," terming this "a project which again demonstrates our company's determination to compete more aggressively for the finest acting and creative talent."

In this connection, it has appeared to some observers that Par over the past several years was piloting itself on a conservative course which resulted in a run of b.o. lightweights. Doubtless significant is the fact that the company for 1962 was in the red for $3,410,000, it's first loss in 27 years.

Now the corporation is bent on entering the competitive sweepstakes for the major productions and, according to Weltner, "Paramount will be second to none in the presentation of attractions of the highest boxoffice caliber." And he calls upon Par personnel to deliver "the hardest-hitting sales and merchandising efforts in Paramount's history."

That Weltner is the key man behind Par's new ambitions seems a certainty. In addition to bringing in the "Seven Days" package, winning out over Metro, United Artists and Columbia, it was he who set up the new Par associations with Joe Levine and Sam Bronston. These tieups will mean four productions from Levine and two from Bronston in the minimum, perhaps more.

Par's sluggishness of recent times is seen at least partially reflected in the behavior of its common stock on the New York Stock Exchange. At one point last year it was selling at $56 per share. Recent trading has been at the $36-37 level.

Meanwhile, exhibitors and all others concerned may well hope that the new change of pace will mean less reliance on such product as "Papa's Delicate Condition" and "My Six Loves."

Finally It's Official: That Astor Injunction Against Keefe Brasselle

N.Y. Supreme Court Justice Gavagan has granted Astor Productions an injunction enjoining Keefe Brasselle and attorney Harold Epstein from exercising any rights with respect to Astor stock until determination of the disputed issues at the May 1 trial.

Brasselle alleges that Astor defaulted on repayment of a $10,000 loan, as a result of which he has right to ownership of 197 shares of Astor Productions stock. Total number of shares outstanding is 200. Astor Productions owns rights to release of "The Trial" in U.S. and some other foreign territories.

Ringe Joins UA, New York

Paul Ringe has been named N.Y. press rep for United Artists, following recent ankling of the spot by Wynn Loewenthal who joined Warner Bros. publicity department. Ringe comes to UA from RKO Theatres where he was a member of the ad-pub staff.

Succeeding Ringe at RKO is Ernie Shapiro, former Film Bulletin staffer.

MOORING SKEPTICAL OF GREEN SHEET SLANTS

Albany, April 30.

William B. Mooring, syndicated columnist in the Catholic press, wrote this week he deplores the decision by the Green Sheet to review and classify pictures which lack the Motion Picture Assn. of America's Production Code approval.

He said the Green Sheet, in which composite appraisals are given by 10 PTA, women's, etc., organizations, is underwritten by MPAA companies who have "sleeping partner subsidiaries." Latter handle the imports which do not meet Code requirements.

It's this type of product which now is to be reviewed by the Green Sheet and will be classified in accordance with the wishes of the MPAA companies, says Mooring, adding this will be harmful and confusing.

JONAS ROSENFIELD EXITS AS COL VEEP

In a surprise resignation, Jonas Rosenfield Jr. is exiting Columbia Pictures Corp. as a staff vice president. Since he moved up into the former Paul N. Lazarus Jr. spot, when the latter left Col to join Samuel Bronston Productions in New York and Madrid, Rosenfeld has been a roving liaison between the homeoffice and its foreign producers. This included executive as well as advertising-publicity-promotion chores which took him to Europe and to Hollywood, as occasion warranted.

The actual ad-pub-promo exec chores were and continue under Robert S. Ferguson, recently upped to veepee.

Coincidentally, but not as a result of Rosenfield's exit, there have been discussions between Jerry Pickman and Leo Jaffe, Col's exec veepee, who just arrived in Hollywood on studio business and returns later this week to the homeoffice. The talks actually represented an approach by Pickman; there have been no negotiations. Col prexy Abe Schneider is abroad for several weeks, including a stopoff at the Cannes Film Festival.

Pickman, who exited Paramount where he was a sales veepee (upped from ad-pub-promo veep), might fit into the Rosenfield slot.

Incidentally, if, as and when such move were consummated it would be coincidental and have nothing to do with Max E. Youngstein's one-picture production deal at Col for "Fail-Safe." Latter was an Entertainment Corp. of America property until ECA setup folded. Pickman was veepee of ECA; Youngstein its president. (As Jaffe stressed, "Fail-Safe" is a solo venture; it doesn't augur Youngstein joining the studio production staff on a permanent basis as might have been interpreted from a VARIETY story last week).

Since the demise of ECA, Charles Simonelli, a third exec, has joined Technicolor.

'Birdie' Soaring To New Highs

"Bye Bye Birdie," now in its fourth session at the N.Y. Radio City Music Hall, hung up a new alltime record of $561,000 in its first three weeks and appears headed for a new four-week high. The $561,000 figure is rated the biggest three-week figure ever registered at any theatre, any place in the world, since the mark attained by "The Robe" at the N.Y. Roxy, in the first three stanzas covered 22 days.

First week of "Robe" was for eight days. Also it's pointed out that the Roxy included in tax money for its three weeks. "The Robe" played at a $2.20 top, higher than the current scale at the Hall. "Robe" still was about $8,000 shy of the "Birdie" mark, tax included, for the first 21 days.

DIVERSIFYING PAYING

Republic's Various Areas Of Profit Pursuit Promising

Hollywood, April 30.

Republic Corp. is experiencing increasing activity in most of its operations. National sales of major kitchen appliances manufactured by Rep's subsidiary, Utility Appliance Corp., are now running about 50% ahead of last year. So stated President Victor M. Carter to annual stockholders conclave here.

Rep divisions and subsids also include Consolidated Film Industries, Republic studios, a motion picture film distribution company and a plastics manufacturing subsid.

At meeting four directors were reelected for three-year terms, including Sidney P. Solow, Franklin A. McCarthy, John M. Fisher and William C. Warren. James M. King Jr. was reelected for one year and Ronald A. Nicholson, a new nominee and a veepee of Webb & Knapp Inc., elected for a similar term. Terms of remaining five members of 11-man board don't expire until 1964 or 1965. These are Carter, John J. O'Connell, William Zeckendorf Sr., William Zeckendorf Jr., and Harry C. Mills.

'Lunar Pull' Away From TV Sets: Authentic Foreign Scenics Help

"American films can use the whole world as their canvas today but it's how you practice this art that really counts," in the opinion of producer-director George Englund whose recently-opened "Ugly American" had a negative cost of about $5,300,000, partially as a result of some global art work.

Some of the exteriors for the film were lensed in Thailand but, by the same token, an entire Southeast Asian village was reproduced on the Universal backlot. So there are apparently some pros and cons to the world traveling location bit. Englund sums up his attitude about atmosphere as being a boxoffice consideration: "people go to pictures for different reasons but location is definitely one of 'em," he feels.

The way to make a foreign-localed picture is through selective shooting and careful planning, Englund avers. "Too often picture-makers shoot scatter shot. They're not absolutely certain when they go what they're going to get," he says, pointing out that some producers and directors waste a lot of time and money making background plates, fore example, which they find they can't use later and so forth.

"You can't get 35,000 Asians for a mob scene in America and you can't get a long vista of patty fields either," he demonstrates. "But you ought to shoot as much as possible in Hollywood," he feels, "because you can control what you're doing much better there. You can't shoot intimate scenes in the middle of a jungle, for example. It's too tough," he notes. "One thing is sure," Englund feels, "the U.S. film business has developed an excellence unto itself in its crews."

He took an entirely-Yank crew with him to Thailand, only picking up a few natives for some jobs. "'Ugly American' wasn't a 'runaway' production by any means," he states, "because we brought our own people, 35 of 'em, with us." As far as the location itself, the producer-director comments that "one of the interesting things is that Southeast Asia hasn't been seen before in films." This he figures will be part of the lure for the pic, although the Marlon Brando name and the title are sure to be stronger attractions.

"If you want people to overcome the inertia of their tv sets you have to create a lunar pull. In order to sell something to today's increasingly sophisticated market it has to be done in theatrical terms, give 'em something they want," he opines. "Names don't mean much simply as names. Just to have them isn't enough. A picture must have character and substance of its own today and it's the obligation of the filmaker to get those involved with his film to do their best," says Englund.

This "doing their best" can include non-theatrical matters as well in the global shooting scheme. In Thailand, for example, the "Ugly American" group found themselves on their toes not to come off as the characters in their script. Part of their job was public relations, as evidenced by the staging of the picture's world preem in Bangkok, the country's capital.

Thailand never had a major movie company in its midst before and, Englund recalls, it was important to make the right impression. For one thing, the area is a good one for picture making and he or others might want to work there again. One of the public relations measures enacted there was the setting up of an exhibition of props, equipment and the like used in the film's shooting. An estimated 25-40,000 natives trouped through the display, Englund claims.

So the making of pix abroad, at least in part, has its meritorious and, indeed, necessary points, according to the young producer-director. Among his upcoming projects will be a script pegged to the activities of the Peace Corps. Eugene Burdick, who coauthored the original "Ugly American" novel, is working on the script. It too will be filmed with various foreign settings, Africa for one, it's projected.

ROBERT GOULET'S DEBUT

First Film Is Metro's — It And Singer's Dates Shifted

Robert Goulet, singer who has been gaining ground rapidly via disks, tv and niteries, will make his film debut in Metro's comedy "His and Hers." Signing necessitated moving the pic's starting date from a planned June beginning to a mid-September one to allow Goulet to fulfill commitments. His pic stint will, nonetheless, force postponement and cancelation of various other bookings.

"His and Hers" is a Pandro S. Berman production to be filmed in Hollywood from an original screenplay by Jay Allen and Harvey Bullock. Ironically, Goulet's pic debut will be in a non-singing role, playing a man-about-town type. He'll be getting star billing.

British Actress Teams In Company to Produce London Jazzman Film

Hollywood, April 30.

Shirley Anne Field, British performer who recently completed femme lead in "Kings of the Sun" for Mirisch, has joined with writer-producer John Mortimer, director James Hill and actor Robert Stevens in formation of indie film company to produce "The Gigsters" in London.

Miss Field, who returns to London next week, said new picture, a jazz musician story, will start by the end of May. Mortimer is completing original script, with Miss Field and Stevens to costar.

Three of foursome earlier were teamed in "The Lunch Hour," which Mortimer wrote and produced and two performers starred in. Continental has been set to distribute picture in U.S., with British Lion releasing in England. Miss Field has a seven percent participation in picture, marking her first percentage venture in a film. She will, of course, also figure on participation basis on "Gigsters."

Actress has one remaining commitment on contract with director-producer J. Lee Thompson, which she said will be completed late this year with "The Pursued," which Thompson is prepping for U.S. production. Additionally, she said she had agreed to do a picture with Jack Lemmon for producer Sam Spiegel but no property or date has yet been set on this film.

"Kings of the Sun" is being aimed as a Christmas release by United Artists.

DIVISION MANAGERS IN FOR WB MEETING

Warner division managers throughout the United States and Canada will be participating in a two-day sales meeting at the homeoffice starting tomorrow (Thurs.) with Morey (Razz) Goldstein, general sales manager, holding the gavel.

Business at hand will be planning for the summer releases, starting with "Spencer's Mountain" and "PT 109" and including "Mary, Mary" and "Palm Springs Weekend."

GOLDWYN WINNERS

Phil Epstein's Son Copa $2,000 First Prize

Hollywood, April 30.

Leslie Epstein, 24, Phi Beta Kappa, former Rhodes Scholar and son of the late Philip G. Epstein, was named winner of the $2,000 first prize in the U. of California-I. A Samuel Goldwyn Creative Writing Competition for his three-act play, "The Speech of Dumb Animals."

Second-place award of $500 was won by Noel A. Black, 25, for his feature screenplay, "Running Wild." Black is a grad student in UCLA's Theatre Arts Dept.

Epstein's father, and his uncle, Julius, were one of the screen's most successful writing teams until his father's death in 1952.

'Please' Okay $15,000, K.C.; 'West' Wow 12½G, 5th; 'Diners' Fairish $6,000

Kansas City, April 30.

Only slight inroads being made by newcomers, just two being in for current week. "Man from Diners' Club" at the Esquire is fairish despite good reviews. "Please Not Now" has a multiple run in three drive-ins and one hardtop, with fair enough takings. "War and Peace" is a mild release at Paramount.

Other fronts have holdovers, with wow biz for "How West Was Won" at Empire in 50th. "Lawrence of Arabia" at Esquire is rated good in 16th week. "Longest Day" at the Brookside and Granada on subsequent-run shapes slick. "To Kill A Mockingbird" is fast in sixth.

Estimates for This Week

Brookside, Granada (Fox-Midwest-Nat. Gen. Corp.) (800; 1,217; $1.25-$1.50)—"Longest Day" (20th). Second week at Brookside, first in the Granada, on first continuous-run here. Dandy $6,000. Last week, Brookside only, $6,000.

Capri (Durwood) (1,200; $1.25-$2.50)—"Mutiny on Bounty" (MGM) (10th wk). Okay $8,500. Last week, $4,000.

Empire (Durwood) (826; $1.25-$2.50)—"How West Was Won" (MGM) (5th wk). Wow $12,500; holds. Last week, $13,000.

Isis (FMW-NGC) (1,360), Crest, Riverside (Commonwealth) (800 cars each) Boulevard (Ensodelle) (750 cars) ($1 each)—"Please Not Now" (20th) and "It Happened in Athens" (20th). Fair enough at $15,000. Last week, sub-runs.

Kimo (Dickinson) (504; $1.25-$1.50) — "Sundays and Cybele" (Davis) (3d wk). Fine $1,700; stays on. Last week, $1,800.

Paramount (Blank-UP) (1,900; $1-$1.25)—"War and Peace" (Par) (reissue). Mild $4,000. Last week, "Critics' Choice" (WB) (2d wk), $3,500.

Plaza (FMW-NGC) (1,630; $1.25)—"To Kill Mockingbird" (U) (6th wk). Nifty $7,000; holding. Last week, $8,000.

Roxy (Durwood) (604; 75-$1.25)—"Man from Diners' Club" (Col). Fairish $6,000. Last week, "Happened at World's Fair" (MGM) (2d wk), $8,500.

Saxon (Durwood) (1,110; $1.25-$2)—"Lawrence of Arabia" (Col) (16th wk). Good $7,000. Last week, $8,000.

Uptown (FMW-NGC) (2,043; $1-$1.25)—"White Stallions" (BV) (3d wk). Stays on unexpectedly, okay $6,000 or close. Last week, $7,000 here and also at Granada.

Detroit, April 30.

Firstrun biz is rolling along at a fast clip again this week, with strong newcomers aiding the big grossing holdovers. "Free, White and 21," aided by "for adults only" ads, seems headed for a big take at Fox. "Miracle of White Stallions" looks great at the Michigan, also an opener. "I Could Go On Singing" shapes good at the United Artists.

Among the holdovers, these continue to do wham biz: "The Birds," in fourth flight at the Palms, "Lawrence of Arabia," in 13th round at Madison, "How West Was Won," in ninth at the Music Hall, and "To Kill A Mockingbird" in fourth stanza at Mercury.

Trade Turns Spotty; 'West' Again First, 'Arabia' 2d, 'Birds' 3d, 'Ugly' 4th; 'Mock'bird,' 'Bounty' Next

Firstrun trade has turned very spotty in current session over the country, with daylight savings time arrival, first real springlike weather over the weekend and disappointing new product blamed by exhibs. Initial two or three mild weekends always cut into biz each spring, and this is proving true this year. But the inability of most new pictures to show up well has hurt most.

"How West Was Won" (MGM) (10th wk) again is No. 1, same as last week. "Lawrence of Arabia" (Col) (10th wk) is holding a firm second. "The Birds" (U) (5th wk) continues strongly entrenched in third spot.

"Ugly American" (U) (3d wk), comparatively new, is taking fourth place. "To Kill Mockingbird" (U) (10th wk) is winding up fifth, displaying marked stamina.

"Mutiny on Bounty" (MGM) (19th wk) is capturing sixth place coin. "Longest Day" (20th) (24th wk), which was seventh a week ago, again is taking seventh spot. "David and Lisa" (Cont) (17th wk) will finish eighth, same spot as last round.

"White Stallions" (BV) (5th wk) is winding up ninth. "Come Fly With Me" (MGM), virtually new, is finishing 10th. "Critics' Choice" (WB) (4th wk) is taking 11th position while "Balcony" (Cont) (2d wk) rounds out the Top 12.

"Diners' Club" (Col), "Could Go On Singing" (UA), "Sundays and Cybele" (Davis) and "Long Day's Journey" (Embassy) are the runner-up pix. Some new films were so weak they failed even to rate this category.

"Free, White and 21" (AI), smash on preem in Detroit, is one of best new entrants currently. "Wrong Arm of Law" (AI), another newcomer, looks big both in N. Y. and Toronto, and okay in L.A.

"Mondo Cane" (Times), comparatively new, still is smash in N.Y. and solid in L.A. "Bye Bye Birdie" (Col), still on a record-smashing run at N.Y. Music Hall, is landing a bigger figure in fourth week than many pictures get opening sessions there. It also stays lusty in L.A.

"Nine Hours To Rama" (20th), while racking up some $30,000 in four keys where playing this week, did not get an okay week out of the lot. "World's Fair" (MGM), socko in Toronto, is rated only fair in Seattle.

"Giant" (WB) (reissue) is okay in Washington and fair in Buffalo. "Days of Wine and Roses" (WB) shapes big in Minneapolis, fine in Toronto and okay in Boston.

Note: The number of weeks out in release for bigger and longrun pix are designated in each case.

Tony Curtis

plus 10% of the action for "Cleopatra," but that on these terms she might even have been "cheated," if her value to the film were to be re-evaluated today.

In defense of actors taking percentage slices rather than flat fees, Curtis cites his five % of the gross on "The Vikings" which Kirk Douglas produced in addition to costarring in for United Artists. He has come out quite handsomely and began drawing coin faster and prior to Douglas though Douglas states "I believe I have caught up with Tony on payments (as co-owner of film his take was from profit end), perhaps I have even passed him. But it is true he started getting money out of 'Vikings' before I did."

Another fine print booby trap awaiting thesps who go in out percentage deals is "cross collateralism," asserts actor. Practice is invoked in multi-pic deals with major studios wherein profits and losses are inter-applied; when though one film might be a blockbuster, if the next is a flop—the thesp realizes no coin. Curtis notes that his production company's multi-pic deal with Universal is on a "film by film" basis.

Gross, Not Net

With 25% of a film's take going for studio overhead and 35% going for distribution, percentage of the gross deals are the only logical move for an actor, says Curtis. "Everybody," he contends, "is trying to steal from the actor."

On alleged unreasonable billing demands made by stars, Curtis declares, "It's like Chrysler spending millions on a new convertible then taking their name off it. Do producers honestly believe the title sells the picture? If they do they're out of their heads—no title matches Cary Grant's name. They pay $600,000 and give an actor 10% of the gross then want to shrink his billing.

"Anything to minimize the actor's position so he will make less trouble in the future is their thinking," continues Curtis. "I won't waive my billing rights and I don't think Rock Hudson, Cary Grant or Frank Sinatra will, either.

"I would like to see five producers sit down with us and state their case face to face. Let's see how fast they cop out," says Curtis of continuing producer blasts at stars. "What would you expect the second rate producer to say after he finds out that he can't get a name even by being nice to him."

"Does anybody ever say that was a terrible Warners Bros. or MGM picture?" asks thesp. "No, they say wasn't that a lousy Tony Curtis or Burt Lancaster or Kirk Douglas picture. The star is the white hunter out in front of everybody else after the tiger; the man taking the chances. He's the man all the critics want to shoot down."

Even in a Billy Wilder or John Frankenheimer picture in which Curtis contends the director is the most important element while film is in production, it's the star whose important after pic has been released, actor insists.

In 15 years of filmmaking Curtis states that he has made only three abroad, "The Vikings," "Taras Bulba" and "Trapeze." He believes economic advantages to overseas lensing are largely neutralized by several factors such as lack of controls and production slowness. The unabashed loyalty he feels to Hollywood and the people he's worked with for many years, Curtis feels is shared by 80% of other thesps, who seldom say it for print for fear of being branded "flag wavers. Any actor worth his salt stays here" contends Curtis, averring that only a handful of cases have actors gone abroad for any other reason than a need for work."

"American actors, writers and directors in Europe are on the edge of the chairs waiting for a Hollywood offer," he says.

His current film, "Monsieur Cognac," now before the Universal cameras had, at one time, been slated for Paris lensing; then switched here. A $350,000 reproduction of a Parisian street has been erected instead by George Golitzen and Ted Howard.

Not Easy to Dig Public's Whims, But Better Days Ahead—Balaban

The $3,000,000-plus loss in 1962 reported by Paramount last week was simply a case of grosses falling off substantially while costs remained the same. But there's beaucoup room for confidence in the future, Barney Balaban told stockholders yesterday (Tues.) in his annual report. The public has its whims and there's no formula assuring production of the "right" motion picture, he said, adding, however, that past and present experience more and more is pointing in the right direction.

Significant statement from the president: "Results of our operations are not expected to have an effect on our dividend date," which is 50c quarterly on the common.

History shows, commented Balaban, that every company in the picture business has had high peaks of successes and conversely slim-profit or even loss years.

It's management's opinion that earnings in the future should be enhanced with such product as "Come Blow Your Horn," "Becket," "Hud," "Donovan's Reef," "Paris When It Sizzles" and "Nutty Professor." The company in a short time will report a profitable operation, says the report.

In 1962 the company bought in 66,500 shares of its own common, reducing the outstanding issue to 1,624,861.

Par at the end of 1962 had total current assets of $80,361,000 and total current liabilities of $24,486,000. Inventories at the end of the year amounted to $55,762,000, compared with $58,296,000 at the end of 1961.

HUGO STRAMER SALES MGR. UNDER MICHAUD

Hugo Stramer, Paramount International's general manager in Germany since November, 1960, has been named sales manager for Continental Europe, North Africa and the Middle East. He'll headquarter in Paris and report to Henri Michaud, who had held this post but just recently was promoted to succeed the late John B. Nathan as division head of the territories.

For the time being Stramer also will continue to function as Par's general manager in Germany. He joined the company in 1957 as managing director for Argentina, Uruguay and Paraguay.

Elliott Kastner Will Helm 'The Crows' for U

Universal's increased production and talent development plans are moving along sharply with the signing of a tenth producer to an exclusive pact. He's Elliott Kastner who's first project will be "The Crows of Edwina Hill," based on a novel by Allan Bosworth, for which Stephen Kandel will pen the screenplay.

On the production side, U has currently put "King of the Mountain" into production, bringing the number of projects currently before the cameras to five, which is the largest number shooting simultaneously for the company since 1957. The Universal-Pennebaker - Lankershim production stars Marlon Brando, David Niven and Shirley Jones and is being directed by Ralph Levy with Robert Arthur as exec producer. Currently in Nice, the company will have lensed for two weeks in southern France when it returns to U studios today (Wed.) for completion.

Other Universal pix currently lensin are "Captain Newman, M. D." "The Chalk Garden," "Monsieur Cognac" and "Dark Purpose." Several other projects are in the works with producers like William Alland, Robert Arthur, Sy Bartlett, George Englund, Ross Hunter, George Golitzin, Harry Keller, Arthur Loew Jr. and Stanley Shapiro, all U staffers. It all adds up to a productive and developmental year for Universal which currently has a couple of hot pix on the market with "To Kill a Mockingbird" and "The Birds," with "Freud" and "Ugly American" also doing nicely.

Strand in Portland, Me., Closes; Duration Indef.

Portland, Me., April 30.

Strand Theatre, 1,700-seater owned by Ralph M. Snider of Boston, will close sometime in May, but whether the shutdown will be temporary or permanent is still unknown.

Manager Leo Young says he hopes it will be only temporary and "prepatory to opening in June" with both "Mutiny" and "Lawrence of Arabia" as the attractions.

Meanwhile the Fine Arts Theatre, only art house here, will change its policy and become a first runner.

Judy Garland's latest, "I Could Go On Singing" will be the first booking under the new policy.

N.Y. Directors Meet June 6

Screen Directors International Guild of New York will hold its annual meeting June 6 at which time executive board and officer elections will be held. A slate of nominees has already been drawn up and voting will be from this list.

A Guild board member serves a two-year term and the union's rules state that once a member has served for five consecutive terms, he must withdraw for a year. Accordingly, several old members will be retiring, temporarily at least, this year. The Guild elects 11 board members and five alternates. Officers are elected from among the board members.

Another Pic Showman Tilts Lance Against Maryland Censorship

Baltimore, April 30.

Maryland board of motion picture censors is under attack again with injunction proceedings instituted in Circuit Court by Robert T. Marhenke, who by own description, is a "small, independent distributor."

Censorship board is separately under attack in Criminal Court by Ronald Freedman, manager of the Rex Theatre, who exhibited a film without approval of board for admitted purpose of contesting censorship laws.

In that case, Judge Anselm Sodaro is withholding decision pending submission of written briefs of argument by assistant state's attorney Robert J. Freeze and by Richard C. Whiteford and Times Film's Felix Bilgrey, Freedman's attorneys.

Marhenke is seeking Circuit Court injunction to prevent censor board from interfering with the showing of motion picture films. Judge Shirley B. Jones has given the board 30 days in which to reply. If injunction is granted, action would be tantamount to nullifying board's powers indefinitely.

Marhenke said he took action when "Peep Shows of Paris," a film he is handling, was shown at the Pocomoke City drive-in without cuts ordered by board when seal was granted.

He said a member of the board, aware that cuts were not made in film, insisted he withdraw it that night (Saturday, April 6).

Marhenke said he was willing to make the cuts at the time he was advised of violation but that board insisted that the film be brought in for viewing on Monday.

This forced him to replace the film with another at the drive-in he said. He said that film had been approved for showing in Washington but that Maryland board objected to "exotic dance scenes."

Marhenke has tangled with the board before. He is promising even more action in near future, he said.

'Peking' in Britain

While Samuel Bronson's production of "55 Days at Peking," as an Allied Artists release is to play the United States on a continuous basis without intermission, the Rank Organization as distributor in England has different plans.

"Peking" in Britain will go on a hardticket basis and with intermission.

Minnesota Allied Unit Told By National Leaders Boycotting No Answer to Films-on-Prime-TV

By LEE RIDER

Minneapolis, April 30.

Possible harm resulting from major features on television prime time Saturdays and Sundays engaged much of the attention of North Central Allied at the national Allied States unit's annual convention here yesterday (30). Another principal discussion topic was what can be accomplished in the way of closed circuit tv in theatres.

Milton London, national Allied States executive director, from Detroit, one of the speakers, told the gathering that competition from the part of product now on network video is a "growing menace" which threatens the entire film industry's existence and nothing should be left undone to eradicate it.

As a cure for this "disease," London said every film contract for a new release must contain a clause granting theatrical exhibition a definite clearance over free tv releases.

"Exhibition obviously does not have the legal or economic means to prevent the release of motion picture product to tv," asserted London. "But this growing menace now afflicting the entire motion picture industry is not exhibition's exclusive concern.

"Production and distribution also are involved vitally. There is only one possible solution which, at this late date, still can save from self-destruction everyone in production, distribution and exhibition. All must unite in insisting, as a matter of self-preservation, that all film contracts on new releases contain a clause in the exhibitor license agreement granting theatrical exhibition a definite clearance over tv releases being shown for free."

London related what national Allied has done thus far to gain this goal. But, he said, no success has crowned its efforts.

"When Marshall Fine was our president he wrote each of the [redacted] a letter which included the question of whether they would be willing just to discuss the question of the suggested clause in exhibitors' contracts," disclosed London. "The replies were evasive."

President Jack Armstrong of national Allied, another speaker, said that "we're doing everything possible to convince distributors that playoff terms must be more 'liveable' for exhibitors."

As for closed circuit theatre tv, he pointed out that portable video projection equipment now is being manufactured for theatre use and can be moved from one showhouse to another to permit exhibitors to push in on such programs as championship prize fights picked up through telephone lines.

Allied States Assn. nationally will not be party to any boycott of distributors as punishment for selling recent features to television for network prime time showing. At least it won't if its president Jack Armstrong and executive director Milton London have their way.

They made this clear at North Central Allied unit's annual convention here yesterday (29), after an angry distributor demanded that MCA use its efforts to get the national body to take lead in uniting theatre owners in such action.

Exhibitor was John Snyder of Williston, N.D., population 12,000. He asked and received permission to address meeting after Armstrong, owner of an Ohio 13-theatre chain, had painted bright picture for exhibitions future.

Snyder called for union of all exhibitor organizations to have their members join together to boycott one company at a time for an entire year each, starting with United Artists. He labeled film companies "S.O.B.'s" for "full treatment" of theatre owners "these many years." This latest development is making it difficult for him, his brothers, and mother to earn livelihood from their theatres, he said.

But Snyder's plea fell on deaf ears as far as Armstrong and London were concerned. Both conceded the development constituted exhibitors' most serious current problem. But Armstrong told Snyder the proposed boycott wasn't the solution.

The two Allied leaders pointed out many film companies have been experiencing financial difficulties which, long live anti-trust laws, are forcing them to sell pictures to tv.

Each explained how film companies also are being hurt by what has happened in consequence of free tv movies, and now are trying themselves to find solution and, in due time, likely will do so. This may mean charging tv much higher rental prices for their pictures or giving theatres clearance advantage over video, perhaps as much as from eight to ten years, they opined.

London called attention to fact that American International is only company refusing to sell its pictures to tv and he called upon those present to reward this by buying AI product.

London said he didn't think pay tv will hurt theatres. He informed meeting MGM's non-roadshow deals for "Mutiny on Bounty" will call for minimum three week runs and 60, 50 and 40% of grosses to distributors. For "Wonderful World of Brothers Grimm" it'll be two weeks and 60 and 40%, same any adjustments in both instances. He warned exhibs to be careful about making such deals.

One of best things happening for exhibitors now, he asserted, is that roadshow films are on the way out—that impending "Cleopatra" and "Fall of Rome" likely will be last such because hardticket films for most part haven't been giving good enough accounts of themselves.

He lashed out against National Screen Service for raising all its prices 10% even to small exhibitors.

NCA president, Martin Lebedoff, exhibitor and restaurants owner, warned members their annual film rental bills may spell difference between remaining in business or going broke.

Berger Rebellion Sans Berger

Minneapolis, April 30.

Bennie Berger is the rebel who did not attend the rebellion. Believed a millionaire, the smalltown theatre operator was expected to stage a tirade against the film distributing companies at the annual convention of the regional unit of Allied States Assn. which is now in session here. But where is BB at the moment? Galeventing in Europe with his wife. This has provoked the quip on Film Row, "Berger victim!" The jibe takes point from this being the Bergers' fourth vacation in a year.

For many years Berger was the firebrand-in-chief of North Central Allied. He was expected to present an updated indictment of present distributor terms as spokesman for his own "ability to pay" thesis. News of this intention prompted queries from Variety but Berger declined explanation on the grounds that his ideas must come fresh to the delegates. But the rationale he was saving for the convention got lost in the impulse to globetrot. The convention is in session, but the gladiator is not.

social comment pictures being done dramatically these days could very well be done comically. It's the most exciting kind of comment there is. But comedy is much the harder medium and there are probably not too many people who know too much about it," the director comments. "Our sense of the ridiculous isn't working."

Sarutch, Sarutch Actors

As far as the comedic actor shortage is concerned, Tewksbury feels that "today's acting training is mostly along Actors Studio lines. That's important but there are other things too. Many times today you see an actor getting all involved in the reality of a situation and totally missing all the comedy of it." He feels that this is really too bad because so much could be done comically if only the performers of today had more range to their training. "One problem is that they're not touching this approach any more," Tewksbury feels.

And comedies can be very lucrative items when the chemistry is there, witness pix like "That Touch of Mink," "Operation Petticoat," "Lover Come Back" and "Come September," among others. There are a few upcoming such as "Come Blow Your Horn," "It's a Mad, Mad, Mad, Mad World," "Bandages," "Who's Minding the Store," "Take Her She's Mine," plus the current "Love is a Ball," "Man From the Diners' Club" and others. These represent a heavier output in this vein than Hollywood has turned out in several years. But Tewksbury feels that an exciting medium like films could do a lot more with the comedic treatment, especially in the area of social comment which is now seemingly largely in the hands of dramatists.

The director is no stranger to the field, having directed such comedy series for tv as "People's Choice," "Father Knows Best" and "My Three Sons," in addition to some live shows in this groove. Following "Sunday," he and producer Everett Freeman have been mulling trying to do a film treatment of off-Broadway's successful comedy "Oh Dad, Poor Dad, Mamma's Hung You in the Closet and I'm Feeling So Sad," a very ambitious project.

Big Downtown Situations; Where To?

Changing Distribution Patterns Keep Raising Questions of Out-Size Film Emporia

Although some circuit execs still aren't admitting it, their old, large downtown houses are no longer the single moneytraps they used to be. Shifting population patterns form one factor and, for another thing, there is the development of the smaller, modern rural showplaces which are convenient and casual by comparison to their downtown brothers.

Distributors have been taking note of this development and have been voicing their favoritism for the newer situations, feeling that there are now the core of exhibition by contrast to the older main street theatres which many consider outmoded and now mostly just weekend showcases. This is the feeling of Carl Peppercorn, v.p.-general sales manager of Embassy Pictures, who notes the razing of several older houses and the remodeling of others to better compete with modern suburban stylings.

Peppercorn feels that the new exhib has a tremendous advantage over the old-styled main street variety showcaser. He also is of the opinion that this young-blooded exhibitor faction will eventually kill off most of the established older houses because these do not have the appeal they used to project, especially by comparison to the more brevity-styled theatres that have been springing up in shopping centres and the myriad of new rural communities that have been sprouting in many areas of the country.

He points to the cheerful decor of most of the new houses and the cleanliness and comfort provided by them. This is conducive to a casual evening's entertainment as opposed to a trip into town and all that goes with it, not to mention the condition some of the older houses are in. He feels that this is having considerable business away from the older houses, especially during the week, and relegating them to a position of being mostly dependent on weekend biz for their support.

Of course, there have been many developments in cities themselves like New York's off-Broadway first-run theatres which have been growing in the east 50s and 60s. These and those like them in the suburbs are the future of exhibition, Peppercorn figures. Districts like 'em because their smaller seating capacities make for longer playtime and greater chance for the development of a picture in areas where there is a good potential audience ready to go if properly lured. The sheer physical makeup of these houses is a strong contributing factor, Peppercorn avers.

Exhibs point to cases of urban development in some areas and say that this is contributing to the health of their main stem hardtops. But the fact remains that, even in these instances, many exhibs have been doing considerable remodeling to get their houses into a more modern, attractive groove, more likely to entice customers away from their tv sets. Of course product has a lot to do with it and exhibs claim that they aren't getting enough, but distribs argue that some theatres are in a condition and are run in a manner which doesn't entice patrons even if there is a good pic.

Naturally there is still a place for the big house. Epic pix of the spectacle nature with big bills to recoup need the capacity of the old barns to sell their wares. But factors like parking and transportation are strong elements in keeping people closer to home for their weekday fare, reserving their journeys to the spectaculars for weekend outing.

Circuits, despite their denials of the trend, have also been active in doing what they can in the new communities, shopping centres and with downtown situations. But one problem facing many of them is their being bound by consent decrees ruling whereby they must go through long hassles in court to get approval for the construction of a new house. Consequently, there has been a move afoot, particularly via the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees, to seek some revision in the decree regulations to make it easier for circuits to expand.

Peppercorn says that he feels the new breed of exhibitors is bringing the biz and will continue to help it with its freshly-styled and maintained plants. IATSE feels that the circuits are interested in expansion along these lines and would like to see it made easier for them to do so. The union has gathered many facts for presentation to the courts and is planning to present its case shortly.

At any rate, it's a situation that has been attracting more and more trade attention as the industry has been recently noting a whole variety of changing patterns taking place and now at hand within it, affecting production as well as distribution. Exhibition is very much a part of these changing times and is getting increased consideration from other elements of the biz as far as scheduling of pix, playtime arrangements and other things. The houses themselves are also getting into the act, as industry self-analysis continues to gain momentum.

3-THEATRE OPENINGS SEEN LATEST WRINKLE

Two-theatre openings in the New York area seem to be giving way to three-theatre runs.

Warners' "PT 109" is set to bow June 26 at the Warner Theatre, on Broadway, the Trans-Lux 52d Street on the eastside and Fabian's Fox in Brooklyn.

"55 Days at Peking" (Bronston-Allied Artists) bows May 29 at RKO Palace on Broadway, the RKO 23d Street and the Trans-Lux 85th Street.

Inside Stuff—Pictures

"Trouble if they do—trouble if they don't." This is a film industry slogan offered by The Value Line, investment survey published by Arnold Bernhard & Co.

Big money has been proved to be in epic-type productions such as "Ben-Hur," "Spartacus," etc. "But once the stars gained control of (such) productions—e. g. in 'Cleopatra' and 'Mutiny on the Bounty'—profits to the studios evaporated as production costs got completely out of hand, although the stars themselves made fortunes," says VL.

The successful studios followed one of two courses, states the Wall Street house. They either made successful blockbusters without signing away all the profits, or they struck gold with family films at minimal costs.

Encouraging is the fact that the companies are in process of development of new talent and "as a result the movies will succeed in recapturing the solid position they once enjoyed," according to Bernhard.

Swedes do not seem to be very fond of their own "The Face of Sweden" films, a set of eight Swedish made shorts distributed in America by Netrc Co. The Swedish newspapers found the pictures "boring, disgust, provoking, undramatic and not very artistic." Most criticized were films with titles "Sun," "Icicle" and "The Expressive Society." The last mentioned is aimed to be a review of Swedish cultural life but according to one Swedish paper it is "only or mostly about director Ingmar Bergman. Though he is very well known in U.S.A. it is still wrong to present just him alone and thus create a false picture of Swedish cultural life."

This reaction came as a shock to a U.S. representative of Netrc at the moment in Sweden.

Partisans tout the new Federico Fellini "8½," as likely to outgross his "La Dolce Vita" of two seasons back. Pio Pandolfi, general sales manager of Cineriz which is releasing the pic in Italy, is projecting an Italian gross of about $3,000,000 on the basis of 26 first-run engagements to date in that country.

Pandolfi notes that the $3,000,000 would be a local record, topping "Dolce Vita" which is Italy's top money-maker as of now. The exec reports that "8½" grossed more than $330,000 total in its first six weeks at the Fiamma Theatre, Rome, and the Capitol Theatre, Milan. Hefty biz is also reported in 14 of the 26 other Italo houses and Cineriz is expecting a total gross for the pic's first two months to exceed $900,000.

Selected for showing out of competition at the Cannes Film Festival, "8½" will have its U.S. preem around June 15 in New York.

Joseph E. Levine's "Boccaccio '70" continues on its winning way in London with hefty grosses in daydate engagements there at the Rialto and Curzon Theatres. 20th-Century Fox is distributing the three-part pic in the U.K. "Boccaccio" set a new second-week record at the Rialto with a gross of $10,525. The Carlo Ponti production hit a big $9,772 at the Curzon.

Last September, National Screen Service instituted a 10% increase in its charges for trailers and accessories, providing the exhibitor being charged hadn't already voluntarily given the outfit an increase. Now several months since its introduction, the fee hike is still coming up against resistance.

At a recent board meeting of the Independent Theatre Owners of Ohio, prez Marshall Fine led a discussion on the National Screen 10%. The result was the conclusion that the boost was wrong without the exhib agreeing to it and that, in some cases, exhibs can't afford the increase. The board suggested that ITOO theatremen look into the situation and determine what should be done individually and or collectively.

The way the increase works from the National Screen point of view is that there's an automatic hike for all those who haven't volunteered an increase within the past three years. Fine and the ITOO interpret the boost to be over and above any voluntary service charge increases. Some resistance on the part of exhibs has been felt ever since National Screen put the increases into effect but the company has managed to get it in force in most locations. It appears that Ohio is among the holdouts.

Annual Variety Clubs International convention will be held this year in Houston, May 14-17. It will be the 36th gathering of the international and a large turnout is expected for the conclave which will gather at the Rice Hotel. Business sessions will include discussions of the charities sponsored by Variety tents throughout the world, with the presentation of the VCI Humanitarian Award capping the convention. Also provided, natch, will be various entertainment features, this year featuring a western flavor with events like a rodeo, Mexican variety show, barbecue and others.

Leslie T. Hunt is chief barker of the host chapter, Houston Tent 34 and Joe Polichino is general convention chairman.

Albany, April 30.

Hopes of motion picture theatre owners, especially circuits, for "relief" from provisions of the New York State Minimum Wage Law were dashed when Governor Nelson A. Rockefeller vetoed (28) an Assembly Rules Committee bill.

It would have authorized a wage board to recommend the employment of 'students' in film houses at less than the prescribed scale —$1.15 an hour—under "special certificates issued by the Industrial Commissioner."

The Governor nixed the measure, with the comment, "There has been no sufficient showing that the economic impact of the statutory minimum wage has or will be such as to warrant approval of this measure."

Bill, introduced rather late in the legislative session, passed the Assembly, on a short roll call, by 143-0.

However, when it "made" the Senate third reading calendar, a "Lay Aide" delayed the vote one day. On the next turn, a brief debate occurred, following which the Democratic minority of 25 voted in the negative. All Republicans, 33, cast affirmative ballots.

$1.50 HOURLY MINIMA MAY HIT BY JAN. 1964

Albany, April 30.

Motion picture theatre operators are being confronted with a possible $1.50 per-hour minimum wage law, up from the present $1.15, then to $1.25 next July 1 and finally to $1.50 on Jan. 1, 1964.

Motion in this direction was made by Assemblyman Jerome W. Marks and it failed in a party vote. But the floor debaters, Republicans and Democrats included, indicated that the $1.50 minimum "is coming."

William C. Drumm, Republican of Columbia County and chairman of the Assembly Committee on Labor and Industries, advised Marks to "send a transcript of your address" to all N.Y. State members of Congress as a preliminary to making the $1.50 minimum a federal measure.

Kemptgen's Retirement

Milwaukee, April 30.

John Kemptgen, MGM branch manager here, retires as of May 1. A testimonial luncheon is being planned. Kemptgen started in film industry as a bookkeeper for the old Goldwyn Distributing Co. in Chicago in 1919.

He was promoted to branch manager at Omaha in 1943, and in 1945 was transferred here.

ment of which we approve and in which we participate in our outlying theatres.

"But the important thing to me," Praught continued, "as well as to quality-minded showgoers and to all those interest ite in maintaining a vital downtown, is that downtown is the showcase of the great metropolitan city, in entertainment as well as in many other commodities. The slogan which hosts 'There's More of Everything Downtown' certainly applies to movies, and will continue to do so."

Premiere Plan

In discussing the changing pattern of releases in the nabes, Praught cited the introduction here of the so-called "Metropolitan Premiere" engagement of a few selected outstanding films, which are shown exclusively in seven or eight deluxe theatres in as many "zones," following downtown showcase runs, but prior to their release to the balance of nabe theatres.

He referred to the "common complaint, well known among theatre men," about the multiplicity of nabe theatres showing the same picture simultaneously, tending to result in discouraging attendance among some showgoers. The "Metropolitan Premiere" idea was developed to eliminate that difficulty and Praught predicted that the label of "Metropolitan Premiere" will become "a sort of mark of quality."

That the plan has met with instantaneous success is indicated by the hot competition among theatres to be among the chosen few selected for each sub-release attraction, and by the eagerness of many film distributing companies to have their top films given this treatment—first, a widely-publicized downtown showcase run; subsequently, an opportunity for exposure on the exclusive, long-run basis in the zones comprising the Metropolitan Premiere plan.

"Neither the company I represent, nor any other exhibitor organization, controls the distribution of motion pictures," Praught said. "We are the buyers, and therefore represent the show-going public in the selection of the films we think they will want to see. Not all of us in exhibition are in accord as to how films should be distributed, or as to which ones should play in which theatres, in a highly competitive field.

"But, it is my personal opinion that this changing pattern of the releasing of films in Detroit will by-and-large benefit and excite the show-going public, and in the end-result will create a wonderful upsurge in theatre attendance."

Anent an indie question on "who gets re-use payments from commercials'," Sayre retorted "the members, of course." He said the indies know this, but deliberately seek to mislead members. Their campaign is one filled with "irresponsible" charges, he declared.

Sayre said he knew of one SEG member who earned over $30,000 for one blurb last year. "This question is made to confuse the members. If they want a list of members who have received such payments, they can have it."

This is a campaign that's gotten down close to the wire, and they've gotten dirty," Sayre said of the indie faction. "We have health and welfare benefits, a death insurance benefits for all members earning $1,000 a year or more. Members don't even pay into the h&w fund producers do," he added.

Regan ticket is running on a "Time for a change" platform, while the Sayre slate is pointing to its experience.

Cartoon Shorts Slow Payoff; Lantz, 47 Years Making 'Em, Rates Television as Medium's Lifebuoy

Hollywood, April 30.

One of the old cornerstones of the picture business, the cartoon short, is crumbling. What little is left must look to tv for survival. This is the assessment for Walter Lantz, the sole indie producer left and turning out the inky characters, for 47 years. "If it weren't for tv I'd be out of business," says Lantz.

Lantz can look back to the day when the annual output of cartoon shorts exceeded 250. Now there are about 90. Walt Disney, MGM, Warners and Columbia accounted for the bulk but no longer make them. CBS has taken over the "Terrytoons" and Paramount turns out the "Popeyes" but Lantz remains the only independent with his 10 a year for theatres. They are "Woody Woodpecker," "Chilly Willy" and a new one, "The Beary Family," each of which runs six minutes.

"They used to run nine minutes," says Lantz, "but the costs became prohibitive and we had to trim three minutes. Even at $35,000 per cartoon for theatrical showing it takes at least five years for a producer to get his money back. It's not only the rising cost of producing cartoons (with its six unions) but exhibitors are paying no more today than they did 10 years ago, despite that costs have risen 100%. Budgets have to be watched so carefully that only two characters can be used. A third would wipe out what little profit there is."

Lantz estimates that the employment level in cartoons is the lowest of any time in the last 30 years. His inky characters are shown in 72 countries, which supply 30% of the income. He figures there aren't 50 good animators left in Hollywood, many of them having moved to other jobs when jobs became scarce due to double billing and that the cost factor that drove most indie cartoon producers out of business.

Television has proved a profitable outlet for his inky characters, especially so with 'Woody Woodpecker,' which will be back on the air for Kellogg's after a two-year lapse. He started with Kellogg in 1957 using the old 'Woody's' never before shown on tv. This time he's adding five minutes of live action to the 18 minutes of cartoons as an educational adjunct to the series. It will be called "Around the World With Wood," a type of traveling. As since 1950, Mrs. Lantz (Grace Stafford) will be the voice of 'Woody' and will create other voices for the new characters he's developing for Kellogg. Half hour shows will run once a week in 172 selected markets.

Lantz produces only six cartoons a year of each subject thereby avoiding over-exposure of his characters. 'Many of the producers no longer around made the mistake of turning out too many and milking them dry.' His staff of 52, many of the key men now in their 25th year with him, will turn out only 10 all year.

COMPO Meets May 15

Congress of Motion Picture Organizations will hold a meeting of its exec committee in New York May 15. Although the exact agenda hasn't as yet been formulated, Charles McCarthy has noted that the session will be an important one 'touching on various industry matters.

COMPO has been active in areas of censorship and theatre taxes, among other things, and the meeting will most likely cover this ground in its course. Other industry leaders besides the organization's execs are expected to attend.

Seek Connecticut B.O. Tax Relief

Hartford, April 30.

Complaining that their "business has fallen from that of the good old days," Connecticut theatre owners have appealed to the Legislature for a helping hand taxwise. Recently, they told the Legislature's Finance Committee that the present state amusement tax on theatres is unfair and unrealistic since it is based on "seating capacity and not attendance." They asked repeal of the tax.

"We've had some lush years in the past, but they're over with," Ralph S. Pasko, Naugatuck theatre operator said. Pointed out he had lost $14,280 in the past five years.

Pasko told the committee that "the tax repeal won't save the theatre, but it would give us some encouragement to continue. Emphasized that his downtown theatre is taxed on the basis of its 923 seat capacity said that the average daily attendance is 170 persons—about one half of them children.

Backing the stand of the theatre owners, Rep. J. Francis Cullen, D. told the committee that "this seating capacity tax was all right in the good old days when theatres were filled near to capacity." Continuing, he emphasized that "theatres are now paying taxes on seats that are unused."

NEAR 20TH TAKES 70% FOR 'CLEO'S' FIRST 13

Minneapolis, April 30.

Although not confirmed by the Minnesota Amusement Co. or distributor 20th-Fox, it's believed that the terms for "Cleopatra" at the Century theatres here call for 20th to take 70% of the gross the first 13 weeks, 80% the next 13 and 50% thereafter.

The aforegoing are against a $350,000 guarantee which MAC already has paid to 20th.

These are stiffest terms ever exacted for any picture here—as well as the heaviest guarantee paid. "Cleo" opens June 26 with a Northwest Variety club benefit at which the entire house will be sealed at $12.50. For the balance of the run the tops will be $3.50 and $2.50 for nights and matinees, respectively.

Kane Discontented

In current North Central Allied bulletin, S. D. Kane, the national Allied State local unit's vice president-general counsel, denounces the way "Cleopatra" is being handled. He says the campaign "nauseates" him and the way that the chain and distributor are acting in regard to the picture amounts to telling independent exhibitors "kindly to go to hell" and the masses that the attraction isn't for them.

Bulletin tirade is headed "'Cleopatra' — What's Biting That Snake?"

'This business prospered when it entertained the masses,' Kane wrote in the bulletin. "But the kind of figures thrown around in connection with 'Cleopatra' indicates clearly that this distributor and exhibitor are shooting at the carriage trade and don't give a damn about the masses.

Crackdown on 'Liberal' Pix, Play And Music in Iron Curtain Countries; Only the Twist Okayed by Russes

By HAZEL GUILD

Frankfurt, April 23.

Liberals on both sides of the Iron Curtain here are increasingly concerned about the Reds' recent reprisals and crackdowns, in East Germany and Russia, against any attempts at democratic presentations in the cinemas, on the stage, the concerts, and almost every phase of the entertainment industry.

While in some respects it had been felt that the Cold War was warming up with increased cultural exchanges between the countries on both sides of the Iron Curtain, in actuality there has been only about one sign of a breakthrough—the twist. In every other phase of entertainment, though, it looks as if the Reds are getting tougher instead of more lenient.

It was with deep concern here that the West Germans, French and Italians heard that Russian "beatnik" poet Evgeny Yevtushenko had cancelled his upcoming American tour due to "illness." The free-thinking, free-spouting angry young man of the free verse circuit made himself a celebrity while touring Europe and airing his free views for several months this year, probably garnering more newspaper space than any other 20th century poet. It's felt here that his "illness" was only that the Commie party got sick of his popularity outside the Soviet Union and wondered if it had really done right to allow him out of the land.

Now, it's just been learned, there are going to be "personnel changes" among the cultural groups in East Germany. Alfred Kurella, former chairman of East German Commie Party's cultural commission, announced the changes since it could not be permitted that people expressing opinions on cultural policy that do not fit with the official line should be able to influence art and culture.

Hacks Fired From Top Jobs

Some examples of his words put into action—Peter Hacks, author of the drama, "Problems and Power" which was turned down by the Communist Party, has been fired as dramatist of the German Theatre in East Berlin. Wolfgang Langhoff, for 17 years director of the former Max Reinhardt Theater in East Germany, is being removed from this post. Only three people recently with the East German Theatre are considered to have an international stature—the opera producer H. Felsenstein, Langhoff, and Berthold Brecht's widow, Helene Weigel.

Mrs. Weigel's Berlin Ensemble (which specializes in putting on Brecht plays) and Langhoff's German Theatre were the only East German theatrical companies to be allowed guest performances in the West. And Langhoff is still first chairman of the East German center of the International Theatre Institute.

Langhoff has long been active for the Commies, his Red career dating back to the late 20's. Because of his pro-Red leanings, the Nazis sent him to Boergermoor Concentration Camp, and after his release he went to Switzerland and published a book report of the concentration camp titled "Soldiers of the Swamp." After working at the Zurich Playhouse during the last World War he joined the German Theatre in East Berlin in 1946.

Langhoff Known As Liberal

His "liberal attitude" in the East German Theatre has been the subject of attacks for the last six years. It was considered an act of defiance that he produced Peter Hacks' controversial play "Problems and Power" at the East Berlin Fest last fall. Now it's reported that 34-year-old director Hans Dieter Maede from the Chemnitz City Theatre will replace him in the post.

And in Moscow, too, there will be a new and tougher attitude toward any "liberal" flights of fancy in the entertainment world according to reports here.

A four-day confab of leading cultural officials was held behind closed doors in Moscow last month. And a new State Committee for Cinematic Arts was formed under Cultural Chief Alexej Romanow. Formerly all the cultural interests were in the hands of Mrs. L. Fur-

Many German Entries In Greece Festival

Frankfurt, April 23.

This year's International Festival in Athens, Greece, which runs from July 25 to Sept. 20 will have more participants from Germany than from any other foreign land. The Frankfurt City Stage has been invited to present Richard Strauss' "Salome," starring Maria Kuba, and "Elektra" with Inge Borkh in the lead.

Orchestra of the Frankfurt Opera, conducted by Lovro von Matacic, and two concerts by the Berlin Radio Symphony, conducted by Wolfgang Sawallisch, are also set. Herbert von Karajan will conduct the Vienna Philharmonic during the festival.

British Exhibs To Fight PRS' Tariff Hike

London, April 30.

British exhibitors are prepping for a showdown fight with the Performing Rights Society to headoff its attempt to hike live concerts' tariff to 4% and base the calculation on actual grosses rather than the present system of annual assessments of use.

The PRS recently wrote to the Cinematograph Exhibitors Assn. giving next January as its intended kickoff date for the new arrangement but offering to allow the increase to progress on a sliding scale from the present 3¼% to the proposed figure through the next three years, reaching 4% in 1967.

The CEA is dead set against any of this. And it has written to the PRS asking whether these conditions are its very last word or if there can be some discussion. If it is the last word then the CEA intends to refer the whole tariff matter to the Performing Rights Tribunal.

It is known that the CEA would be willing to meet the PRS some way by agreeing to "a modest increase" in the percentage. But it regards the figure of 4% as "both excessive and unrealistic." Additionally, it will never accept any requirement for its members to divulge their actual grosses for live concerts.

Set 2d Cinerama House in London

London, April 30.

Cinerama will be having a second West End showcase by next July. A deal has just been closed for the takeover of the Coliseum Theatre in St. Martins Lane, which for the last two years has been leased to Metro. That company's lease expires on May 19, and Cinerama will start conversion the following day.

The Coliseum will make its Cinerama bow with "The Wonderful World of the Brothers Grimm," "How the West Was Won," which had its world preem in London last November, remains at the London Casino, where it is still doing boffo trade.

Meantime, negotiations have been completed by Cinerama with both the Rank and Associated British Cinemas groups for provincial showcases, and openings are planned for late summer or early fall. Deals so far concluded involve four situations, but it is expected the total will climb to about 10 in the coming months.

Theatres involved are the ABC, Bristol Road, Birmingham and Gaumont, Birmingham (Rank); Coliseum, Glasgow (ABC), and Queens, Newcastle (Rank).

German Pix Take More Of Spain's Playdates

Frankfurt, April 23.

German films are doing surprisingly well in Spain, it's just been revealed by the West German Film Export Union here. Last year, there were 72 firstruns of foreign films in Spain. And 26 were German productions (including six German-foreign co-productions).

That represents a constant increase of German films playing in Spain, up from 17 in 1960 and 20 in 1961. Most successful were "Rest is Silence," "Youth Judge," "Travel Bicycle," "Man Goes through the Wall," "Labyrinth," "Love on Gallows" and "Friday at 11.30."

Miracle to Sell All Gala Product

London, April 30.

A unique tieup between Gala Film Distributors and Miracle Films was revealed last week by Kenneth Rive, Gala managing director. From the end of June, Miracle will be responsible for sales of all Gala releases as well as its own product. Each company, however, retains its own identity, and no stock swaps or board interchanges are proposed.

Under the new setup the combined Gala-Miracle operation will make the outfit the biggest independent in Britain. At the latest count, Gala had 132 releases and Miracle about 12. The Gala program includes the foreign output distributed by Columbia and Metro, and these pix, too, are included in the deal.

The Miracle staff, headed by Phil Kutner and Dick Michaels, will move into Gala House in Soho. Michael Myers will assume the post of general sales manager, assisted by Vic Hewitt and Harold Posner.

As a sequel to the deal, Len Hape moves over from distribution to become production executive of Galaworldfilm Productions, though Sidney J. Furie, a director of the company, remains in overall charge of Gala's independent productions. The current filming schedule is now under way with "Devil Doll," which started rolling at Merton Park earlier this month. This is a coproduction with Gordon Films, Inc., of New York, which represents Gala in the Western hemisphere. Gala will continue to represent Janus Films and Gordon Films in Europe.

The deal between Gala and Miracle is for two years, with options, and both Rive and Kutner emphasize that it is just a selling, and not a distribution, operation. Each company will be maintaining its own publicity and executive departments.

ABPC Topper Blasts Those Who Want To Destroy the Circuits

London, April 30.

Sir Philip Warter, chairman of Associated British Picture Corp., lashed out at individuals and organizations who were attempting to break the power of the circuits. Proposing a toast to the guests and the press at the company's annual showmanship awards dinner at the May Fair Hotel, Sir Philip turned to the fourth-estaters and said: "I am not asking you to take sides in this matter, but if these attempts succeed there will be no industry left about which you can write."

Describing the recent representations to the Board of Trade as "ridiculous" the ABPC topper said if they destroy the major groups, they will destroy the industry. It was nonsense to suggest they were monopolists. They had never attempted to monopolize production, and his company had kept the studios going and maintained production in difficult times. He commented that it was a "silly idea" to go to the Board of Trade on such an issue.

Easter Hypoes West End, 'Lawrence' Record 25G, 10th; 'West' Grand 36G, 'Longest Day', 'Story', Mutiny' OK B.O.

London, April 22.

Dull weather over the long Easter weekend boosted all first-run grosses, with particularly outstanding results for the long running hard-ticket shows. Leading the field in this group is "Lawrence of Arabia," which hit a record $25,000 in its 10th Metropole week. "How the West Was Won" topped a mighty $36,000 for 21 performances in its 25th frame at the Casino; "The Longest Day" hiked $19,000 in its 30th week at the Leicester Square Theatre; "West Side Story" did a stout $16,500 for its 60th sesh at the Astoria; and "Mutiny on the Bounty" was a steady $10,000 for its 22d stanza at the Royalty.

Among the regular attractions, "Boccaccio 70," day-dating at the Curzon and Rialto, was over $18,000 in its third week at both theatres. At the Warner, "Wrong Arm of the Law" set up an alltime house record with a mighty $21,000 in its fifth week.

Warner (WB) (1,785; $.70-$1.75) "Wrong Arm of the Law" (BLC) (6th wk). Solid $14,000, playing concurrently with London release. Previous week established new theatre record for fifth round at $21,000.

First Scot Cinema Bar For Glasgow's Cinerama

Glasgow, April 30.

Drink facilities will be provided in a Scot cinema for the first time at the Coliseum Picture House here. Plan is being set up for the arrival of Cinerama productions.

There are to be two licensed bars, one in the stalls, the other in the circle. Glasgow Licensing Court okayed a license for the owners, Associated British Cinemas Ltd. Opposition came from a city minister, Rev. Keith Edwards, who said there were already ample facilities for drinking in the area and that no other Glasgow cinema had such a license.

Stress Pacted To Produce Two Pix in Israel

London, April 30.

Producer Raymond Stross, just back from a month's vacation and biz trip to Israel with his actress wife, Anne Heywood, has contracted to make two films in Israel, both partly financed by the Israeli government. One skedded for shooting early next year will be a straightforward yarn. The other, not yet worked out in detail, will have a more serious theme indigenous to Israel. They will be made in English, with dubbed versions for the Israel market.

"I was most impressed with Israel," admits Stross, "and, anyway, making films over there is a producer's delight. A film budgeted here for $$420,000 can be brought in over there for about half that amount. Local labor is cheap and most of the filming will be done on location because it would be criminal to waste all that sunshine."

If the experiment works out, Stross hopes to make a film a year in Israel. Meanwhile, he is committed to make "Angel," starring Miss Heywood, later this year.

W. Germany Plans 2d Western Pic

Frankfurt, April 23.

West Germany's first venture into Western films, "The Treasure in the Silver Lake," which starred ex-Tarzan Lex Barker and was filmed in Yugoslavia, proved such an offbeat hit here that a sequel will be made.

Producer Horst Wendland is heading for Yugoslavia on June 1, to start production on "Winnetou." The same director, Harald Reinl, who turned out the initial German-Yugoslav version of an American Western, is going to work on the sequel as well.

Once again the film will be a coproduction of Rialto and Jadran Films, and like the initial German western, it will be a costly production. Stars are Pierre Brice, as Winnetou, and Lex Barker repeating his role as Old Shatterhand. Others in the cast are Maria Versini, Mario Adorf, Ralf Wolter, Eddie Arendt and Goetz George.

K.O.'d by Mishap, Singer Carried Back for Bows

Athens, April 30.

U.S. baritone John Modenos singing Verdi's "Simon Boccanegra" at the Olympia dropped to the stage at the end of Act III, supposedly dying of poison. He struck his head on the prompter's box and was knocked unconscious. Curtains closed in.

His failure to take bows led to chorus shouting by audience and Nicola Moscona and Ludo Kouroussopoulos half carried him, still dazed, and supported him for the curtain call.

Vet Producer Praises Location Work

Val Guest Claims Shooting Away From Studio Gives Film Needed Authenticity

London, April 23.

Val Guest, producer, director, and writer, is a staunch believer in the authenticity that location work gives to a film. His "Day The Earth Caught Fire" was filmed largely in a Fleet Street office. "Jigsaw" was shot mainly in and around Brighton. For his current film, "80,000 Suspects," Guest practically took over Bath in the West Country. It's the story of a smallpox epidemic and the people of Bath have provided Guest's cast, with the exception of the leading roles.

Guest has found that local authorities are usually remarkably co-operative providing they are approached with tact. When Guest approached the Bath authorities for permission to shoot in the local hospital, a colonel on the committee was clearly miffed about the whole idea.

"The local health chief welcomed the project and squashed some complaints that associating Bath with an epidemic would be bad publicity for the city. But then he came up with a remark which had certainly never occurred to me and shows how careful a film producer has to be. He said that he thought it would be useful for local citizens to know what steps were taken locally to meet such an emergency."

The locals became so excited about the filming that Guest had no difficulty in getting people into evening dress for a ball sequence though it was shot before most of them were due to go to offices and factories. Nor did he have to worry overmuch about waiting for quiet spells for traffic shots. He approached the authorities with such conviction that, on several occasions, traffic was diverted and streets cordoned off to meet his requirements.

On the huge outdoor lot at Pinewood he had to shoot a sequence where a hotel is burned down. The entire set had to be covered with artificial snow at big expense. The day before he was due to shoot it started to rain. Fortunately it was only a shower.

But, argues Guest, the problems are worth it. "I'm convinced that the less you have to shoot in a studio the better. If you keep the goodwill of the locals then you are home and dried. If '80,000 Suspects' flops anywhere it won't be in Bath. After a week the local inhabitants were referring to 'our' film and I'm convinced that some of the authorities who were a bit chary about the whole project are now almost convinced that the entire idea of filming it in Bath was theirs."

New Pix Distrib Outfit To Help British Lion Handling Pix & Prod.

London, April 30.

Producer Anthony Havelock-Allan is the first chairman of a new company just formed to operate in association with British Lion. Peter de Sarigny and Graham Tharp are jointmanaging directors of the firm which is to be called Nova Film Distributors.

Sidney Furie, Peter Finch, Guy Hamilton, Cliff Owen and John Bryan are others on the board of directors. The new outfit will be available financially to back productions by outside indie producers as well.

No properties have yet been named but it is understood that Furie, Owen and de Sarigny are all at the moment working on potential subjects, two of them in the scripting stage. Its finances will also be available for films both from Nova members and outside filmmakers. As a distrib group within the British Lion orbit, Nova will have complete control over the pix it decides to back.

British Lion topper David Kingsley says he welcomes the new group in particular because ". . . their initiative in forming Nova reinforces our view that the people best qualified to sponsor and control film production are the filmmakers themselves."

Fox's London Duo

London, April 30.

Two new appointments have been made by Percy Livingstone, 20th-Fox managing director in Britain, to fill the publicity directorship vacancy caused by the resignation of John Ware.

Roland Hill, advertising and publicity director for Nicholas Luard Associates, owners of the Establishment nightclub and publishers of three magazines, is the new publicity director, and Ronald Shinn, formerly with Anglo Amalgamated becomes assistant publicity manager. Both posts come under the supervision of Fred Hift, 20th's publicity supervisor for Britain, Europe and the Middle East.

Holland Cinema Attendance Off

Amsterdam, April 23.

The Nederlandse Bioscoop Bond (Dutch Cinema League) in its annual report for 1962 confirms that cinema attendance in The Netherlands in one year declined another 6%. This means an extension of a declining line that started in 1960. In that year, film houses attracted 69,900,000 people but annual cinema attendance slipped to 50,800,000 in 1961.

Dutch Cinema League is fighting to abolish the entertainment tax, and on the local front (in individual cities) has reaped some victories. But a government law banning the tax will be the ultimate goal. Last year, 44 cities reduced the entertainment tax to some extent, but this will not show on the books until 1963. Average entertainment tax in Holland on cinema tickets is now 22% against 22.2% in 1961.

However, revenue intake was maintained on the same level as in the previous year because of higher admish prices. Firstruns are not so much in trouble as neighborhood theatres and cinemas in the provincial cities. Attendance at firstruns in the big cities was 90.3% of that in 1961. Neighborhood theatre had a decline in attendance and revenue. Cinema attendance in Amsterdam, Rotterdam and The Hague accounted for 37% of the total.

CEA Warns Embassy Of British Exhib Attitude On Films Playing TV

London, April 30.

The Cinematographic Exhibitors Assn. came through with a politely phrased reminder to Embassy Pictures that if it was busy selling feature films to tele in the U.S., it had better not forget to leave out any UK rights' clause because showing features on tv here just isn't done.

The note went to Kenneth Hargreaves, Embassy's top man here. It's understood he replied assuring the CEA that Embassy Pictures Corp. was "fully aware" of the association's attitude to features on tele. The CEA, for the moment, is perfectly happy knowing that.

On this tack, life on the Continent is not quite so happy, or so it seems according to a report of the International Union of Cinema Exhibitors submitted to the CEA exec committee. There they have a problem that the UK is not bothered with: the hours spent by millions of the public watching features on tv in bars and cafes.

In Belgium, where an agreement had been made between the tv interests and the film trade, feature pix are now unrestricted and tv seems to have thrown the agreement out the window. In France, exhibs are actually suing the tv authorities for heavy damages.

At its last meeting, the International Union issued a strong plea to distribs not to part with feature pix to tele and initiated the first feelers looking towards an agreement with the International Federation of Film Producers' Association (FIAPF).

Liberal Pix

tseva, who remains Cultural Minister of Russia.

However, it's reported here, Mrs. Furtseva had favored a "new Soviet style of films" two years ago and some of the films made under her reign had been too "liberal" and "westernized" for the current Soviet tastes. Or at least the tastes of those in power.

The Moscow meet came through with a resolution that no more Russian films would be made "in the image of Italian or French films with realistic impressions." But they would instead be made with "socialistic realism." The cultural critics were particularly against the influences of plays by Western dramatists, suggesting that more of the Soviet dramatists should be showcased.

And it was charged that the young generation of Russian literati were "sensationalists" who refused to use the subject matter and themes and traditions of the older Russian writers. New Film Minister Romanov reported that films cannot question the friendly co-existence between the Communistic and the popular ideologies without danger of overstepping into anti-Communistic fields.

Meanwhile, back in West Germany, the Association of North West German authors is concerning itself with the problems of works by German authors in exile, with works of the anti-Hitler and anti-Commie writers who have come in from East Germany. It is proposed that money be raised to finance research by qualified scientists into the field of literature written by these exiled authors, with help from the Federation of German Authors' Associations and the Permanent Conference of the Ministers for Cultural Affairs of the West German Federal States.

But Twist Is Obeyed

It seems as if the only realm where the Reds cannot control public opinion, though, is that of the Twist. Popular young East German record star Petra Boettcher recently indicated that the Soviet authorities have relented when she appeared on a top East German TV show—doing the until-then-forbidden twist.

And the European rep of an American music publisher noted, "The Soviets are afraid the twist will cost them prestige and money—because they didn't invent it." Getting the rights to a popular American or European platter would cost the East Germans as much as $10,000 for license fees—and the regime has long balked at turning this kind of money over to western lands.

In 1960, the Ulbricht government of East Germany forced the radio and tele stations, musical groups and record producers to turn out at least 60% of their productions, with tunes where the rights originate in the East block countries. In spite of this, though, the East German composers', authors' and lyricists' association AWA (the East German counterpart of ASCAP) paid $132,000 to their West German sister group, the GEMA, for musical rights belonging to western composers and lyricists in 1960.

Twist Secret Yank Weapon?

The Twist had been cited as "an American secret weapon brought to us via the ether waves", and some local East German music associations had tried to make the radio, tv and local musicians groups increase their East-West music ratio from the 60% to as much as 80%.

Result of all this control has been that twist records from West Germany have become smugglers' items no. 1—as the record fans and the radio and tv stations all vied to get the late platters and air them without paying any union fees. People living near the boundary turned to West German radio and tele to hear the new twist tunes.

First official note that the Communists took of all this under-the-counter trade was when the "twist" was quietly included in the category of "fox trot" music in a new East German listings each fall. And when Petra Boettcher was permitted to sing—and dance—the twist record "Erst kommst du" (You Come First), the ban was actually taken off. Not only that—but the records of the same song, which is a Twist classified as a Foxtrot—have been on the most popular East German sales list since Christmas when the platter was released.

ber is a straight melodrama of Puerto Ricans vis a vis immigration to Manhattan. This was directed in San Juan (some stock American footage included) by Fernando Cortes, also from Mexico, and with his wife, the former Cuban soubrette, Mapy Cortes, in the cast. Title in Spanish, "a Mo-yo Borrincano," is described by Rosa as the old nickname for the island. Running an hour and a half, film was brought in for $76,000.

"We do not yet have studio facilities in San Juan," Rosa explained, "and rely upon exteriors. Where we need interiors we negotiate with hotels and other places for use of necessary real-life settings. We hope that the Commonwealth may ultimately help Puerto Rican film production."

Various outsiders, including indie producer Lester Cowan, attempted in the past to interest the Commonwealth in financing studios but original encouragement collapsed.

Deal Set By Egon Klein

"La Mente Borrincano," produced in Puerto Rico by native filmmaker Damian Rosa, acquired for release in the United States by Egon Klein of Columbia. It's the usual percentage-distribution arrangement.

Film is for Spanish-audience theatres in the States.

British Tell Test Conditions Draw Telemeter Objections

London, April 30.

British Telemeter Home Viewing Ltd., one of Britain's leading contenders for payvee franchise, is challenging the government over the efficiency and validity of format of the proposed field trials now being lined up. Postmaster General Reginald Bevins has laid down a limit for the tests of single channel, one program systems. Telemeter insists that multiprogram systems are the only true test.

In fact it has warned that if it does not succeed in its battle with the PMG on this point, it may well have to pull out because the $1,000,000 a year test would not be economically possible. It would then make its equipment available to some other operating outfit which might be willing to utilize it under the government's conditions.

These points were made and a new audience measuring gadget unveiled at a special conference called by the company last week (25) headed by vicechairman Roland Williams and David Kingsley, British Lion topper and a director of the Telemeter company. The new gadget could, with slight refinements, be used to give an overnight Nielsen type rating together with an actual audience reaction picture so enabling programmers to decide immediately on the demand for a repeat or otherwise.

It's British

This is a purely British invention hatched by the Telemeter technologists here, which has not been tried out in the Canadian Telemeter system payvee tests.

But none of all this would be of any use, both toppers insisted, unless they were given the kind of scope only possible with the freedom to use all three lines in their system.

"Only a multi-program presentation can serve minorities effectively and provide real freedom of choice," said Williams. "Trials which are held in the public interest should be encouraged to try out the whole range of ideas and philosophies, not just one which reflects a narrow, restricted viewpoint.

"To justify the heavy expense of the forthcoming trials of pay tv we must be allowed to demonstrate the full potentialities of it. For this reason more than one simultaneous program should be offered in at least one trial area—or all of them if the participants wish to do so. The present trial is to be restricted to wire, but there is no reason why multi-programming should not be tested. It is technically quite simple to achieve."

Both execs recognized that the Post Office's reasons for so restricting the trial was fear that if given fuller scope to payvee system might act as an unfair competitor to both BBC and indie channels. But in fact, as Kingsley pointed out, such a synthetic restriction applied intentionally by the Postmaster, might well achieve just what he was hoping to avoid.

Can't Experiment

"If we are restricted to one program then, instead of being able to appeal to minorities, we shall be forced to compress everything into a single channel service rather like the present BBC and ITV systems pushing minority programs into unpopular early or very late hours and keeping the mass audience programs of pure entertainment content for the peak hours," he said.

"In reality what we should like to be allowed to prove is that we can find minority audiences sufficient to make our system pay, during the peak viewing hours. We need around $1 a week in every box to break even on the average."

The Telemeter dream is being free to use one line to pipe light entertainment, one the more erudite cultural entertainment and the third pure higher education even to developing a kind of tv correspondence course in all kinds of post graduate subjects. Initial talks with various educational institutions to this end have already been held.

Telemeter Home Viewing has asked for the test area covering four municipalities in South London—a definite population of 250,000 with a surrounding "spread" population in adjoining districts of another 1,750,000. The test will be carried out in 2,500 homes drawn from as near as possible a cross section of the entire population of the U.K. The installations will be free but the viewer will pay for programs, otherwise the test would not be truly valid.

Telemeter also intends to instal its own exclusive "monitoring" audience-research gadget in each of the 2,500 homes. This will consist of an extra electronic box and a push button rather like a remote channel selector. At the end of each program on screen will be flashed a series of simple direct questions such as, "Did you like the show?"—"Did you not like the show?"—"Were you indifferent to the show?" and "Was it shown at the right time?"—"Too late?"—"Too early?" The viewers are asked to press the button and hold it for the few seconds that the answer that suits them is shown on the screen. This is registered on the tape fitted in the control box on which is also registered which show was being watched and the duration. These tapes are then fed into a computer at the company labs.

Normally the time lag might be a week or two. But during the tests readings will be taken more frequently and with slight adaptation the gadget can be used for direct and immediate reaction at the company's hq.

Seek Sacramento Television Test

Washington, April 30.

Capitol TV Co., Inc., licensee of KVUE-TV, Sacramento, Calif., has petitioned the Federal Communications Commission to approve a three-year toll television test in Sacramento on Channel 40. KVUE has been inactive the past three years.

Melvyn E. Lucas, who heads Capitol and the Melco Pay TV Co., said his system entails transmission of the video part of a program normally, with sound sent either through a subcarrier from the transmitter or by telephone line to an FM station where it is multiplexed. Lucas asked approval for one or both systems.

Home subscribers would pay $10 per month for 16-to-40 weekly hours of subscription programming, most of which would be current feature films. Capitol hopes to start with 500 subscribers and figures on an increase to 8,000 by the end of the first year of operation.

Vaughn Group Buys Texas Antenna Firms

Dallas, April 30.

Dallas Investor Jack C. Vaughn and a group of associates purchased Texas' largest community television antenna system for more than $1,500,000. Television Cable Service Co. Inc. and the East Texas Transmission Co. of Jacksonville and Tyler were bought from Raymond Hedge and Glenn Flinn, Tyler businessmen.

Sale must be approved by the Federal Communications Commission.

The television community service system brings to residents of the two east Texas cities tv channels 4, 5, 8 and 11 in Dallas-Fort Worth and Channel 7 in Tyler.

Participating in the venture are Television Properties Inc. of Dallas, which will own 80% of the system, and Green Capital Corp. of Midland, with 20 per cent interest. Charles C. Green Jr. is majority owner of the Midland firm.

Officers of the joint venture operation include Robert H. Young of Dallas, president; John Mankin of Tyler, veepee and general manager; Green, veepee, and L. W. Reichelderfer of Dallas, secretary-treasurer.

Human Rights Probers to Pound Madison Ave. Beat; Report Raps Ad Agency Neglect of Minorities

Madison Ave's top execs can look forward to personal visits from exec staffers of the New York State Commission for Human Rights in the wake of recent studies highly critical of the ad industry's attitude toward minority groups.

Commission's own report, submitted after a five-month study by NBC pubaffairs production exec George Norford (on leave from the web as a consultant to the state org), stated that the "hard core of resistance to casting Negroes and other minority group members in roles other than menial or token seems to come from persons in advertising agencies."

And also recently turned over to the Commission for follow-up action is a report from the Urban League of Greater New York, declaring it has met with "little or no success" in a four-year campaign to open jobs for Negroes in the city's multi-billion dollar ad industry. Urban League said its report was also being filed with the New York City Commission on Human Rights and President Kennedy's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunities.

New York City Commission just previous to the state and Urban League reports conducted a survey of agencies and advertisers on use of minorities in print ads and tv commercials, with a spokesman reporting to VARIETY that the group felt it was "getting a run around."

In an effort to find a "workable program" that will get Negroes and other minorities fair and adequate representation in programming and advertising, Norford and George M. Fowler, chairman of the state commission, plan to meet with top ad execs in an effort similar to the one the commission has carried out with the networks. During preparation of the group's recent study, Norford and Fowler held separate meetings with web toppers Robert Sarnoff of NBC-TV, Hubbell Robinson, formerly of CBS, and ABC's Tom Moore. They also journeyed to the Coast to discuss the problem with production execs of both independent houses and the networks.

While the report cited some progress in the casting of minorities, Norford said that most of the advance had been made in the "Sunday cultural ghetto" of sustaining pubservice offerings, a development that would reflect sponsor fear of integrated casting for commercial tv fare.

Chairman Fowler, discussing the plan in personality approach ad men, said, "The fear of sponsors that southern television viewers might take reprisals against their products when a Negro performer was employed has little basis in fact." He said that tv producers in the main agreed with the Com-

All This & Closed-TV

Pete Rozelle, boss of the National Football League, got something else besides money out of NBC-TV. Remembering last season's nightmare, which had the network refuse permission for N. Y. closed-circuiting of the Giants-Packers championship game, Rozelle this time did not give NBC the contractual right to slap closed-circuit.

Game will be played in the home of the Western division winner (and unless the game is played in Green Bay, which has a relatively tiny b.o. potential, anyone of the other member cities could provide a lot of b.o. heat). NBC says it has no first refusal rights or any promise from the NFL to let the web in on the closed-circuit, but various NBC execs refused to rule out the possibility of the network later buying in.

NBC Price Tag On Pro Football: 75G Per Minute

NBC-TV plans to sell a minute in next winter's professional football championship game for about $75,000, and there are 16 commercial minutes available in the event. Still and all, the network could very well lose money as it gains friends for having bought the single game.

It's a gamble of sorts—if there is a setback, according to NBC, NBC will make a small but tangible profit. But that also means that advertisers will be willing to meet the price. There are plenty of them interested, in a general way, in the game.

A record price of $926,000 was bid by NBC-TV last week, and this evidently beat out the only other tv bid, that from CBS. It was the first deal made, incidentally, by Tom Gallery since his sports department was moved under the direction of NBC News, and it is meant as a sign that the network

Femme B'casters Set Top Figures For Philly Meet

Philadelphia, April 30.

A number of top names in radio and television have been lined up to do the panel and speaking. Chores for the 12th annual convention here of American Women in Radio & Television this week (May 2-5).

On the opening day of general sessions, Friday (3), TV Guide magazine publisher James Quirk will give the keynote address. Convention's main dinner speaker will be wife of the vice president, Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson, herself a Texas broadcaster. Saturday headliner will be CBS News correspondent Marvin Kalb.

Panel sessions also will include ad., industry execs, both male and female. Panel session on "Women in Communications Today" will be moderated by Ed McMahon of NBC's "Tonight" show, and the participants will include Marion Stephenson, veepee of administration, NBC Radio; Patty Cavin, manager of pubaffairs for RCA in Washington; Hazel Markel, White House correspondent; Geraldine Zorbaugh, general counsel, CBS Radio; and Mary McKenna, veepee of Metromedia.

Panels on the convention theme, "Leadership—its opportunities its responsibilities," will include (for Susskind vs. Korn: Who Fired Whom?

Living and dying by controversy, the long-running "Open End" show has been yanked off WNEW-TV, broadcasting stations in an acrimonious tangle of cross claims and contradictory charges. To the counterpoint of producer David Susskind's "I quit" and MB prexy Bennet M. Korn's "you are fired," the two-hour gab show is being cut off after next Sunday's (5) show, five weeks before the contractual season ends on June 2.

Korn said he was paying off Susskind and terminating "Open End" because of the latter's "vituperative and libelous attacks." At a dramatic press conference at his WNEW-TV, N. Y., headquarters where police had to be summoned to eject a highly vocal alleged gatecrasher, Korn said that the cancellation of Susskind's show involved the "issue of responsible broadcasting."

"We contracted for 'Open End' two years ago with the clear understanding that Mr Susskind would abide by our standards of good broadcasting. It was our policy and practice over this period to approve each subject to be discussed and the panel of guests selected. It could be no other way . . . We cannot delegate this control to Mr Susskind or anybody else."

Tackling Susskind's complaint that WNEW-TV censored his show on "The American Sexual Revolution," Korn said "after this program was screened thoroughly by us, it was decided that it would be detrimental to the public interest to Telecast it." Korn circulated a transcript of a portion of that show where panelists recommended contraceptive devices for teenagers and pre-marital relations. Two of the panelists, Korn stated, thanked him for not running the show.

'Open End' Wide Open

David Susskind is still dickering for a New York berth for "Open End" for the 1963-64 season.

Nibbles have come from WCBS-TV and WABC-TV, but no definite offers have shaped up to date. Susskind has indicated interest in putting "Open End" on WNDT, N.Y., the N.Y. educational channel, but cannot make any deal in this direction until WNDT comes to a settlement with AFTRA, of which Susskind is a member.

'Chronicle' Paired With 'CBS Reports'

The umbrella title of "Chronicle" has been put on the series of pubaffairs programs which will alternate with "CBS Reports" on Wednesday evenings next season.

Series, under the guidance of Jack Kiermaier, pubaffairs v.p. of CBS News, will consist of eight hourlong and 12 half-hour episodes. Kiermaier will utilize the stable of CBS-TV pubaffairs producers developed over the past few seasons for the outing.

Charles Collingwood will have a central and continuing role in each of the broadcasts. The themes will range from the people and character of France, as seen through the eyes of her great writers, the British music hall; political and social revolution in the 20th Century, the writings and life of Edgar Allan Poe the Constitution of the United States, the Italian movie makers, and the life and times of James Thurber.

Producers will include Richard Siemanowski, Don Kellerman, Warren Bush, and J. C. Sheers.

TV Network Sales: Hardly a Ripple

With some $50,000,000 in minutes still to be sold for the first quarter of '63-'64 (Oct.-Dec.), business came to a virtual standstill last week for the three television networks. A few oddlot sales were locked up, including some hefty NBC daytime biz, but no substantial prime time advertising coin appeared to be stirring on Madison Ave.

It's no secret, of course, that some big coin has been lost to network tv next season, as, for example, U.S. Steel and General Electric. Nonetheless, network execs are optimistic, banking on the expectations that some major advertisers will loosen up their money bags during the May there. A lot of money from the automotive and food industries, for example, is still to be committed. When it is (and if the networks can hold the line on established rates) it's figured the new season will be off and running on a sound economic footing.

Maeve's Rave: N.Y. Scripters Get Proper Recognition; Not So on Coast

Camera Obscura

Washington, April 30.

Chances of television coverage of U.S. House committee hearings have taken a 180-degree turn.

A change in House rules to let tv cameras into committee rooms seemed a cinch when it was officially proposed by Rep. Orva Harris (D-Ark.), a legislator of considerable influence. At the time, the Harris proposal was known to have the support of House Speaker John W. McCormack and the chairman of the House Rules Committee, Rep. Howard Smith (D-Va.).

For reasons unknown, both McCormack and Smith changed their minds, and action on the Harris resolution has been indefinitely postponed by the House Rules Committee.

CBS Radio Sales Upsurge; Station Compensation Up

CBS Radio's sales momentum, which started with a surge this year, has developed to such an extent that the network "has more business on its books for '63, right now, than it had for the entire year of '62," according to prexy Arthur Hull Hayes.

Reflecting this upturn is the Hayes announcement that station payments for the first quarter of '63 will be 26% higher than was anticipated when the present compensation plan was adopted last fall. Hayes went on to say that by the indications of business already on the books for the second quarter, compensation for this period, promises to be 46.3% greater than anticipated.

CBS Radio prexy said that sponsor participations in the web's news-on-the-hour broadcasts and in "Dimension" have absorbed more than 80% of the availabilities in these programs. Additionally, web has hung its SRO sign on the following shows: Allan Jackson's morning reports; Garry Moore, Lowell Thomas; the five-evening-a-week programs, "It's

WNEW Pacts Heffner To Sub 'Open End'

Richard Heffner, who recently exited New York's educational WNDT station as general manager, has been signed as moderator of a new two-hour series, "The American Experience," to be produced by Metropolitan Broadcasting stations. Bowing May 19, it will fill the time slot being vacated by David Susskind's "Open End" show on WNEW-TV, N.Y.

"The American Experience" will run for six weeks. It stemmed from a program series which the late Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt had agreed to do shortly before her death. It was originally planned as a one-hour show, but has been expanded to two hours in discussions of such topics as "Limited Warfare in a Nuclear Age," "The Legacy of Hiroshima" and "Our Future in Space." Heffner is receiving $700 for each of the six shows.

Hollywood's purported newfound respect for writers, with some now even producing or directing their own screenplays, doesn't extend to the video scriptors, says literary agent Maeve Boothgate, who operates out of New York.

"Coast members of the video scriveners fraternity are used to having their work summarily—and sometimes, in their view, unintelligently blue-penciled," she declares. "Furthermore, it is not uncommon for the purchaser of their plays to try to tie up subsidiary rights, including movie and world tv and theatrical, at no extra cost, even though the scripts are ostensibly being acquired for a tv one-shot."

In New York, however, the tv author and his contribution are treated with deference, says Miss Boothgate, and on one-shots the producer rarely raises the question of having subsidiary rights thrown in free of charge.

The literary agent says she took stock of the east-west comparative situation recently in sharing regrets with New York scripters over the axing after eight years of the U. S. Steel Hour (final show set for June 12.) She's credited with having sold more scripts to the Theatre Guild production than any other agent. This season's total was eight, topping such writers as Jack Pulman, David Turner, Robert Storey, James Elward, Arthur Hailey, Leslie McFarlane, John Holt and Elaine Morgan.

Why the east-west discrepancy in attitude toward writers? Miss Boothgate figures it could be because Coast tv has taken its lead from feature film folk, who, in the early days, "struck an attitude of superiority toward writers, and they've maintained this rigid stance ever since. There are exceptions, of course, among both the Coast tv and picture producers. But they are vastly in the minority. On the other hand, here in

Clear Decks For Ford Anni Replay

It took five months to accomplish but, finally, the Museum of Modern Art in N. Y. received permission to replay as part of its "Television Retrospective" the 50 anniversary tv program produced for Ford Motor Co.

Seven days before the "Retrospective" was to close, which was to be tomorrow (Thurs.), the last of the clearances came through. Unable to squeeze the tv spectacular into the final days of the Museum schedule of memorable tv programs since '40, it was decided to extend the "Retrospective" through Saturday (4).

Approximately 70 persons appeared on the original program, produced by Leland Hayward and carried on both CBS-TV and NBC-TV. Not all of them could be found, particularly many of the chorines. There is a union ruling against the reuse of a tv program without the performers' permission, and in the case of this Ford one-shot it had not been acquired. Therefore the Museum could not show it on tape in its basement theatre.

Ford, AFTRA, Kenyon & Eckhardt, CBS, NBC and Hayward, among others, served for weeks and weeks as agents of the Museum. Among them they finally rounded up all the permissions necessary from the ladies of the chorus.

$500,000,000 ROLL OF DICE

Gee, Dad, Thanks

Considering the fact that CBS-TV has nothing of momentous import on the agenda when it brings the affiliate family into New York next week for the annual meeting (unless they want to talk about spiraling earnings and swamy Nielsens), prexy Jim Aubrey and his boys are doing perhaps the only possible thing left to do—letting Danny Kaye, Judy Garland, Phil Silvers and the cast of "Beverly Hillbillies" run the show.

For the first night of the getogether, CBS has cornered all the best seats for the Danny Kaye performance at the Ziegfeld Theatre for an affil "sneak preview" of their Wednesday night 10 to 11 star next season. For the second night banquet, it'll be a two-star performance, with Judy Garland and Phil Silvers.

And the entire meet will be "formatted" so that the "Beverly Hillbillies" cast will be "at home" with the delegates.

Perry Wolff's Show-Biz Pubaffairs Parlay as Man With TV Tour Yen

By MURRAY SCHUMACH

Perry (Blue) Wolff, the man who started all the tours on television, has the bug himself. He's on a fevered tour of western civilization, as producer of CBS News' "Frontiers of Freedom" and a yet untitled series on the theatre.

The upcoming tours include Elizabeth Taylor's London. There was Grace Kelly's Monaco tour last season. He, himself, tried to tour the Kremlin last year, but the project was nixed by Moscow.

It all began with "The White House Tour with Mrs. John F. Kennedy," telecast on Feb. 14, 1962, produced by Wolff, and since then it's been a Valentine's Day for tours on tv. Wolff hasn't been involved in such tv tours as those conducted by Princess Grace or the projected London walkabout of Liz Taylor. There's the show biz bug in Wolff, too, but his focus is pubaffairs.

Listening to Wolff, when he has his pubaffairs eyes in focus, is like hearing echoes of a college lecture on the arts of antiquity, on the history of modern man. He spins off names in the Age of Pericles, as if he were an Athenian visiting Madison Ave. He switches from a concept associated with the slave society of Egypt to his concept of modern-day communism, as practiced in Russia.

It so happens his office is on Madison Ave., in the pubaffairs suite a few blocks north of CBS' home office. It so happens he's a young man wearing the tv mantle of a scholar. Television does things to people, even to scholars.

"I wish the accounting department took care of things," he swore. Producer explained that he paid a good deal of the production expenses in Greece while filming there out of his ow resources. "The accounting people are very nice people," he averred, indicating, though, that the department still has to catch up with his expenses.

"All right, what do you want to know?"

The phone rang.

"My secretary happens to be out today." He lifted the phone, his eyes appealing for support from the ceiling.

Phone down, he asked CBS publicist Kathy Wallace to act as his phone secretary during the inter-

Bing To CBS-TV; 4 Lever Specials

Add to CBS-TV's '63-'64 home-of-the-stars schedule Bing Crosby, with Lever Bros. agency Foote, Cone & Belding currently seeking a companion client for four one-hour variety shows hosted by Crosby.

Prime time specials with Crosby negotiating guest shots with Red Skelton, Bob Hope, Jackie Gleason and others, will be slotted on CBS in November, February, April and either late in May or early in June through the season.

FC&B's tv programming chief-tain John B. Simpson says the deal will be wrapped up with the sell-off of half of the four hours to a bankroller compatible with Lever's Pepsodent.

Hotpoint's NBC-TV Coin

Hotpoint Co. has bought a reported $500,000 worth of time on NBC-TV's "Tonight." Deal begins the middle of May and runs almost to the end of '63.

In all there will be 75 commercials used on "Tonight" by Hotpoint. They'll all be in color.

Webs Poised For Space Blastoff, Blow-By-Blow

The three television networks very probably hope that Maj. L. Gordon Cooper comes down from his orbital flight sometime before it gets dark, because if he doesn't it will definitely cut into their primetime schedules.

The major is expected to go up into orbit around the earth the morning of May 14, on the longest space trip taken by an American. He is expected to stay up some 33 hours, and if he gets off late on the morning of the 14th, he just might come down late on the evening of the 15th. Possibly working in favor of the networks, however, is that the flyboys and NASA might like very much to bring him down before darkness makes it difficult to follow his descent.

Blastoff is due at 8 a.m. but Cooper might not actually get off until 7 or sometime after. This has been the case in other orbital flight starts.

General plans call for covering the entire first Cooper orbit (which should be around 88 minutes) from time of blastoff. All three networks thereafter will probably do a sort of running coverage of the flight by superimposing bulletins over regular programs. Plus that, there will be hourly picture-voice reports or, if

'Play Your Hunch' As Fall NBC-TV Casualty; Prep Two New Entries

It looks like "Play Your Hunch" will be a daytime casualty on the NBC-TV schedule come the fall, with the network currently at work putting two new entries into preparation. Both are being wipped up on the Coast.

The possible sub shows are audience participationers. One is tabbed "Let's Make Music." The other is "People Will Talk." "Play Your Hunch" is currently being stripped 10:30 to 11 a.m.

'Laffs for Sale' on Ice

Although the half-hour comedy panel show "Laffs For Sale" didn't make it on the upcoming NBC-TV sked, the program is being kept on ice by the network in the event of a casualty come January.

"Laffs" is emceed by Hal March. Pilot program features Joey Bishop, Buddy Hackett, Gypsy Rose Lee and Sheldon Leonard.

COUNTDOWN ON 3-WEB SHAPEUP

By GEORGE ROSEN

Last week's lock-in of "Redigo" (half-hour version of the 60-minute "Empire" drama anthology series) for the NBC-TV Tuesday night 8:30 period marked the official closing of the '62-'64 schedule by the three television networks. Thus the die is cast in a nearly $500,000,000 (total cost of programming) roll of the dice in the who'll-do-what-to-whom programmatic sweepstakes. There's no turning back. At this point the patterns and the sponsor commitments are set.

For all the fact that the new season is still five months off, the "profiles"—with all three webs dedicated to different approaches and tangents — are already discernible, as witness:

CBS is going the star route. Whether it's a Judy Garland, a Danny Kaye, the return of Phil Silvers, or the continuing weekly round-robin of a Lucille Ball, a Jack Benny, a Jackie Gleason, a Danny Thomas, an Andy Griffith, a Dick Van Dyke, Red Skelton, a Garry Moore or an Ed Sullivan (or in the area of limited specials with a periodic Carol Burnett or one-time projection of an Alfred Lunt-Lynn Fontanne, an Elizabeth Taylor and an Ingrid Bergman) —it's the marquee lure of top names on which CBS is primarily pinning its hopes for a fresh whack at the high Nielsen points, in the bid to retain its commanding lead in the competitive rating race. Jim Aubrey & Co. have amassed probably the greatest collection of stars ever assembled by a network.

NBC, on the other hand, appears to have dedicated itself to the filmed anthologies perhaps more than ever before, putting heavy reliance on Lew Wasserman's Revue operation and Bob Weitman's MGM mill to translate '63-'64 into respectability. Its "Mr. Novak," its Richard Boone series, its "Virginian," its "Espionage," its Bob Hope-hosted Chrysler series, its Kraft dramas, its junior size "Redigo"—these, in the main, along with the continuing "Bonanza," "Kildare" and "11th Hour," background the NBC drama anthology or semi-anthology pattern that is the key to next season's operation. As one keen industry observer put it: "If Wasserman and Weitman can deliver, NBC could have it made."

Otherwise, NBC is turning over four hours of prime time per week to movies (out of the 20th and Metro post-'48 libraries). The success of the Monday-Saturday features will depend on the merit of the individual pix. Audiences play it by ear—week to week. The good ones only recently, over a four-week stretch, took the play away from Danny Thomas and Andy Griffith. But if NBC's loaded with bottom-of-the-barrel entries, the results can be just the reverse, as witness the newest Nielsens (the first April report). The four prime time NBC features and the two on ABC covering the two-week Nielsen period averaged out to a 14.7. And as every Nielsen student knows, a 20.0 is the passing mark to respectability.

NBC has trimmed its variety hours. Perry Como will be doing only a handful. The Andy Williams

Sam Paley's $27,000,000

Philadelphia, April 30.

Estate of Samuel Paley, father of William S. Paley, board chairman of CBS, was valued at $27,000,000, according to the will filed for probate by attorneys for his executors.

By the will of the retired manufacturer and philantropist he made sizable bequests to charities through the Samuel Paley Foundation and the William S. Paley Foundation. Will also provided trusts for members of his family.

Samuel Paley died at the age of 87 in Florida, March 31.

NBC Chants 'No Strings' But FCC Wants to Probe Deeper Into 100G Gift to Educational TV Channel 13

Webs' WGA Offer

Dickers between Writer's Guild of America and the networks are still going on. Sides met Thursday (25), again Friday and through the night into Saturday (27).

There was enough progress to keep the Guild from calling a strike. Talks were officially extended 15 days beyond March 31, and since then have simply continued without any formal extension. Guild negotiators will present the latest package offer to their council today (Wed.).

Robt. Sarnoff As Reluctant Witness At Philco Hearing

Washington, April 30.

It takes an emergency or a fast breaking news story for an NBC o&o station manager to upset a network broadcast, board chairman Robert Sarnoff said here today (Tues.).

In most cases, NBC holds the reins over web programs on o&o's with prexy Robert Kintner having the final word on any switches, Sarnoff told an FCC hearing.

Sarnoff was a reluctant witness at the hearings for NBC's petition to swap its Philadelphia outlets, WRC-TV-AM, for WNAC-AM-FM-TV in Boston.

Philco originally applied to operate the Philly station, then withdrew, and is back in the picture with New Frontier vig-ah. Under questioning by Philco attorney Henry Weaver, Sarnoff defended NBC's policy of high-command decisions on programming in the o&o's.

In a heated exchange he said corporate officers are in charge of the o&o's but major decisions are still made in N. Y. The board chairman said he was unfamiliar with program under question by Philco. Weaver asked specifically about Philly's substitution of a movie for a religious program, "Frontiers of Faith," in April, 1957. Sarnoff said he was unfamiliar with the switch.

The witness denied emphatically that NBC launched a major review of its Philadelphia programming when Philco jumped into the fight over who gets the Philly channel.

Also due to testify are Kintner and Raymond Welpott, exec veepee of NBC owned and operated stations and also general manager of the Philly properties.

Al Capp: 90% of TV Stations Are 'Operating In Public Disinterest'

St. Paul, April 30.

Cartoonist-syndicated newspaper columnist Al Capp of "Li'l Abner" comic strip fame has appeared a number of times as a paid guest on such television shows, network and otherwise, as "Tonight" and Steve Allen's. He even has made a commercial for video. But while in the Twin Cities to lecture at Macalester College here he was anything but overly complimentary to the medium.

Capp told interviewer Minneapolis morning Tribune staff writer Judy Vick that "90%" of the nation's tv stations are operating illegally" and was so quoted in her sheet.

The reason for this allegation, he

Washington, April 30.

Future of N. Y.-N. J. educational Channel 13 has grown foggier as the Federal Communications Commission prepares to investigate conditions allegedly made by NBC in giving a $100,000 gift to the station.

In fact the FCC is reported ready to probe all gifts for the station, including the other networks as well.

Report of the investigation broke the very day examination of the NBC station franchise (in contest with Philco) opened here.

Two weeks ago, VARIETY broke a story that before CBS and NBC each gave WNDT $100,000 to help keep the educational station alive, a deal was reportedly made. Allegedly, Dr. Samuel B. Gould, president of WNDT, promised the commercial broadcasters that ultimately his station would convert no less than 80% of its schedule to instructional programming.

This would mean moving out of the cultural-general educational areas which some commercial tv'ers consider competitive to them. However, immediately after the VARIETY report Dr. Gould strongly denied its truth. Since that time, though, the FCC has been following the case.

Jack Gould, in the N. Y. Times of yesterday (29), said that the FCC was interested in a letter from NBC to Dr. Gould (no relation). In the NBC letter, written April 11, chairman Robert Sarnoff, now here on the Philco matter, said the $100,000 contribution had been affirmed by the NBC board.

The NBC letter went on to state that Sarnoff had been concerned that the educational station was going to "close down" and the $100,000 would not go to serve the purpose intended. "However," he said, "I understand from you that with this contribution, the possibility of the station's closing down is avoided," and asked Gould to write him reaffirming that statement.

Sarnoff's Letter

Part of the letter that evidently got the FCC here excited enough to pursue an investigation was this: "I was impressed," Sarnoff wrote, "by your outline of plans for the future of WNDT and your conviction that the station must evolve a pattern of operations where the bulk of its service would be directed to the type of educational programs which would serve a specific teaching function, and the rest of the programming would be directed to specialized interests not met by commercial broadcasting.

"It seemed to me that this ob-

Ustinov & Quinn 90-Min. Special

An original 90-minute drama, written by Peter Ustinov titled "Velvet Knife," will be telecast next season by CBS-TV. Ustinov also will star and direct with Anthony Quinn sharing star billing.

David Susskind will produce for Talent Associates-Paramount. Associated in the production will be British Home Television, a pay tv outfit of England, and CBS-TV.

The drama set in postwar Italy, concerns a former Mussolini hatchet man brought to trial, defended by a lawyer once imprisoned by the Fascists. Ustinov will portray the freed defense lawyer and Quinn the one-time Fascist hatchet man.

The Ustinov drama is the second deal which finds CBS-TV associated in production with British Home Television, the pay tv outfit. The other, also slated for telecasting in '63-'64 by CBS-TV, is the Royal Ballet broadcast. It's one of Mike Dann's major entries since he took over the CBS programming reins.

Educ'l Station Defends Feeding Of News Tapes to Com'l Outlets

Hollywood, April 30.

A charge lodged with FCC that a Sacramento educational tv channel is competing with private industry by funneling news shows to commercial stations was sharply denied by John Crabb, manager of the etv station, KVIE. While conceding his station did supply tapes of news events, Crabb said it did not make any coin on it and a minimum service charge didn't even defray costs.

The allegation against the station was made by Herbert Aller, biz rep of IATSE cameramen's local 659, in a letter to the FCC. In his formal complaint, Aller said the taped news events supplied by KVIE were sponsored by ad agencies for private industry, and he protested it on grounds an etv station shouldn't compete with private biz.

Crabb, informed of the Aller charges, said he was not sent a copy by the L.A. man, and this was the first he had heard of it. He explained KVIE tapes on a fairly regular basis three events—Gov. Brown's news conference; and news conferences held weekly by the majority leadership in both legislative houses. Assembly speaker Jesse Unruh (D.) and pres pro tem of the Senate, Sen. Hugh Burns (D.). Recently the station began taping news conferences held by the two minority leaders, Sen. John McCarthy and Assemblyman Charles Conrad, both Republicans, of course.

The Sacramento station feeds the news events with the legislative chiefs to KXED, an etv outlet in Fresno. Primary purpose of these tapings, is to cover state government for etv release, the manager explained.

"Incidental to that—and there is nothing in the Federal law to prevent our doing this—we have made arrangements for the tapes to be dubbed and sent to two or three commercial stations in L.A. They use excerpts on their news shows," Crabb explained.

He said two costs are involved. One is for dubbing which KVIE doesn't do. Consequently, Sacramento commercial stations do such work for a fee. "We assess a $50 service charge to the commercial stations that want them, to pay the costs. There are two exceptions. The broadcast equipment we use in the Capitol is loaned us by NBC in Hollywood so we make the tape available to their L.A. station at no cost. Because we call on the three Sacramento commercial stations for help, we give them the tapes free. They help us and we help them.

"The FCC rule is that we cannot sell time on the air. We are not selling time. There is nothing in the rules which says we can't use our facilities to make money," Crabb said, adding that on the tapings of the news shows, the coin the station receives actually is not enough to compensate for the costs involved. "It helps us meet the costs," he added.

KVIE supplies such tapes to KTLA and KNXT locally as well as NBC's outlet, KNBC.

'New Breed' Sales

"The New Breed" has been sold by ABC Films into an additional seven markets in the last couple of weeks, adding up to a total of 26 stations buying the hourlong show.

Latest sales include KVOS-TV, Bellingham, Wash.; KCPX-TV, Salt Lake City; KATU, Portland, Ore.; KSHO-TV, Las Vegas; WKRG-TV, Mobile; WTVR, Richmond; and WDAM-TV, Hattiesburg.

Col. U, WNEW-TV In New Educ'l Tie

Another tieup between Metropolitan Broadcasting and the Columbia U. School of International Affairs is generating a new series of "Columbia Seminars in International Studies." Half-hour series is being run on WNEW-TV, N. Y., Monday-through-Friday at 7:30 a.m. with one repeat each week at Sundays at 11 p.m.

New series is an outgrowth of the "Columbia Lectures in International Studies," which has been telecast over WNEW-TV for the past two seasons. The current show features a panel of three Columbia U. faculty members in discussions of topical subjects. William A. Wood, associate professor of journalism and director of radio-tv at Columbia, will coordinate the seminar project for television. Paul Noble is producing for Metropolitan.

In another area of public service programming, WNEW-TV is launching another Sunday evening show, "Community Dining," examining issues affecting New York, New Jersey and Connecticut. Alvin Edwards is hosting this series.

EDITORIAL CONSULTANT FOR LEON GOLDSTEIN

Leon Goldstein, veteran N. Y. broadcaster who was formerly vice-pres of WHCA, has joined WABC Radio, N.Y., as editorial consultant, as part of the station's formation of a editorial board under Hal Neal Jr., v.p. and general manager of the station. With WHCA for over 20 years until his exit a few years ago, Goldstein was one of the spearheads behind that station's pioneering stand in favor of on-the-air editorials.

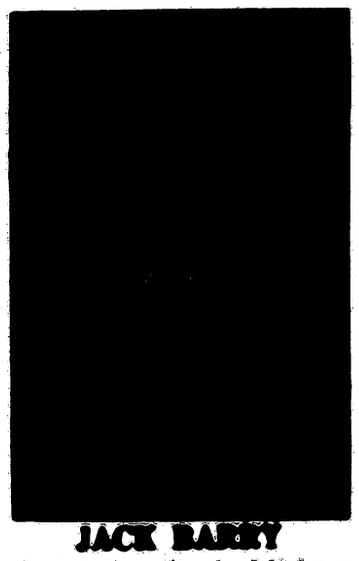
WABC Radio plans to "speak out" on major local civic issues, treating each subject for a full week.

HARRISON'S SALES SLOT

Philadelphia, April 30.

Thomas D. Harrison Jr. has become national sales manager of the Franklin Broadcasting Co. Afterwards, the company which owns WFLN AM-FM here gave his old job as local sales manager to Harry J. Maas Jr.

One more sales change was made at Franklin. Ralph Collier, WFLN's ayem gabber, is "expanding" in the sales department, too.



JACK BARRY

In just 10 weeks, the 7:30-8 p.m. segment of the Monday night "JACK BARRY SHOW" is now tied for first place as the HIGHEST RATED SHOW on KTLA, Los Angeles.

Com'l TVer Blasts Ga. Educ'l Station Use of Features

Atlanta, April 30.

Raymond E. Carew, general manager of WALB-TV, Albany, and v.p. for television of Georgia Assn. of Broadcasters, has complained that Georgia's educational television stations are showing first-run motion pictures in competition with commercial television.

Carew said that he plans to write a letter of protest to Gov. Carl E. Sanders about state etv's nighttime programming.

Sanders told reporters at a news conference in Atlanta that he did not know what's being done by the stations, but agreed they ought to stick to classroom subjects.

"I don't think they ought to compete with private industry," the governor declared. "I feel like all the programs being produced ought to relate themselves to the education field in the state."

Gerald Appy, associate director for the Univ. of Georgia's Center for Continuing Education, in Athens, where WGTV, state etv station is located, said it was not his policy to stick strictly to classroom topics for the night program or, necessarily, to avoid competing with commercial tv.

"The notion that a station should not run feature films because it is not a commercial station has no substantiation in rules of the FCC," said Appy.

He added: "The classroom is not necessarily the primary aim. The University of Georgia long ago accepted responsibility to serve the whole community."

Appy, a professional actor who was in commercial television with various stations in Atlanta before taking up his present post in Athens, said that while he usually seeks to show something more than pure entertainment he may use a motion picture that has no educational value as such, but be-

The Law Goes Gunnin' for WTCN-TV

But St. Paul Authorities Backtrack In Incident Over Murder Weapon

Minneapolis, April 30.

Considerable of a rumpus was stirred up in and out of Twin Cities' broadcasting circles when William Randall, St. Paul county attorney, denounced Life-Time's unaffiliated WTCN-TV and then hushed water.

The altercation took on added heat because a rival station, WCCO-TV, CBS affiliate, on one of its newscasts told listeners that Randall had assailed WTCN-TV for doing what the county attorney said it shouldn't have done. That was revealing over the air the identity of a person from whom a gun was stolen to commit a murder, a scoop for WTCN-TV.

Murder in question was that of a St. Paul criminal attorney's wife who had been life insured for more than $1,000,000 the past year.

There were more fireworks when Randall ordered the WTCN-TV reporter out of his office at the start of a news conference.

WTCN-TV vowed especially crabby and took additional umbrage because WCCO-TV in the offending newscast declared that Randall had charged it with hampering the arrests of some of those allegedly implicated after the St. Paul homicide officer had ordered it not to do so.

When the WTCN-TV reporter at the news conference was ordered out of the county attorney's office because "his station impeded the authorities in running down alleged participants in the crime and others by making known about the gun prematurely," there were plenty of fireworks.

The reporter not only refused to depart but took the county attorney to task because, as a matter of fact, the homicide policemen actually hadn't ordered him not to disclose anything. The key officer simply had said he preferred silence pending arrests, but the tv station should use its own judgment.

County Attorney Randall then relented and admitted he probably had been too severe. He blamed it on being "too worked up" over sudden developments in the case and lack of sleep.

This bashing water satisfied WTCN-TV and over the air it related how it had been chastised. However, no apology was forthcoming from WCCO-TV.

'Bowery Boys' Sales

Nine additional stations have bought 40 "Bowery Boys" features, distributed by Allied Artists Television.

New deals include WTTV, Indianapolis; WJRT, Flint, Mich.; WCHS, Charlotte, Va.; WAFB, Baton Rouge, La.; KREM, Spokane, Wash.; KTVV, Little Rock; WIIC, Pittsburgh; KLAS, Las Vegas; and KATU, Portland, Ore.

Marvin's 3-Market Insurance Client

Lincoln Life Insurance, long associated as sponsor of United Artists Television product, has bought "The Lee Marvin Show" for telecasting in three markets, Lexington, Louisville, and Oklahoma City.

Another longtime UA-TV client, also a current "Bigcard" sponsor, Savannah Sugar Refining Co., has set two more stations in its five state marketing area: WCSC, Charleston, S. C.; and WBTC, Charlotte, N. C. Previously reported were Savannah buys in Georgia, Tennessee and Virginia.

New station buyers of "Lee Marvin Show" are WTAR, Norfolk; KOGO, San Diego; WJXT, Jacksonville; KELP, El Paso; KOTV, Tulsa; and WNDU, South Bend-Elkhart.

In the rerun field, UA-TV subsid Brenamoor reports sale of "Sheena Queen of the Jungle," newest off-network hourlong entry, in 14 major markets including Los Angeles, Chicago, Detroit, Dallas and Indianapolis.

'YOU ASKED FOR IT' $66,065 RESIDUALS

Hollywood, April 30.

Total of 107 AFTRA performers will receive $66,065.39 in residuals from the telecaster, "You Asked for It," reruns payments for past four years, under an arrangement closed by L.A. chapter of American Federation of TV and Radio Artists.

Under an agreement reached with Marvel and Anne Lipsky, owners of the series, $18,000 already has been recovered and $8,000 paid to the AFTRA Pension and Welfare Fund, according to union's legal counsel David Ziblind. All residuals owed will be received by performers over a maximum period of seven years, Ziblind said.

NBC's Click Satire In Adaptation for WNEW

"That Was The Week That Was," BBC-TV's click satire on the news, is being adapted for the U.S. via an experimental half-hour show, "What's Going On Here," for telecast on WNEW-TV, N.Y., and WTTG, Washington, both Metropolitan Broadcasting stations. Jonathan Miller, Peter Cook and John Bird, British performers in such satirical revues as "Beyond The Fringe," "The Establishment" and "The Second City," will be featured on "What's Going On Here."

Roger Bowen, an American writer-actor, will also be seen on the show. Co-producers are Clay Felker, former senior editor of Esquire, and journalist Joan vanden Heuvel. Arthur Forrest will direct.

Robt. Storer's New Post

Atlanta, April 30.

Robert M. Storer, youngest son of George B. Storer, Sr., founder of Storer Broadcasting Co. and chairman of Board of Directors, has joined WAGA-TV, Atlanta, as sales promotion director, it was announced by Ken Ragwell, station manager.

Young Storer is transferring to Atlanta from the same position with KGBS, Storer radio outlet in Los Angeles.

At WAGA-TV he will head up station merchandising, research and sales promotion under the direction of promotion manager Ned Jay.

Triangle Group In FM Assn. Joinup

Philadelphia, April 30.

The five FM Radio stations of the Triangle Stations group have the National Association of FM Broadcasters (NAFMB). It was announced by David J. Bennett, director of FM operations for Triangle.

The Triangle group, with separately programmed FM and AM stations in five markets and tv outlets in six, decided to join the NAFMB after that organization retained Jim Schulke as its president and fulltime chief executive.

"Each of our FM stations," said Bennett, "are programmed independently of our AM outlets. So far as we are concerned we consider that the problems which confront FM broadcasters can best be solved by a new, young vigorous organization dedicated to the cause of frequency modulation. For this reason we have decided to support the NAFMB with the membership of the five Triangle stations."

In accepting the membership, Schulke said, "we anticipate and expect that both Dave Bennett and Triangle will actively participate in the affairs of the NAFMB. Both are veteran and professional broadcasters, so aware of the special assets of FM as to provide their stations with exclusive programming, and so experienced as to provide a reservoir of advice and aide which can prove invaluable to the NAFMB and to frequency modulation."

The Triangle stations joining are: WFIL-FM, Philadelphia; WFBG-FM, Altoona, Pa.; WNBF-FM, Binghamton, N. Y.; WNHC-FM, Hartford-New Haven; KFRE-FM, Fresno, Calif.

Special Projects Division for KPRC

Houston, April 30.

Ray Miller, assistant manager for news at KPRC and KPRC TV, has been appointed editor of the new Special Projects division at KPRC TV by Jack Harris, veepee and general manager.

Robert Marich has been named production director of the new division. He will continue as producer-director of KPRC TV's "Midnight with Marietta."

Charles Pharris director of newsfilm operations for KPRC News, who has received many national awards for his film stories, will supervise motion picture filming for the new division.

In preparation for increased activity, Miller said three experienced radio newsmen have been added to the KPRC News staff. They are Larry Nasco Will Sinclair and Antonio Cornuda.

Cameos On a Faraway Beach

Hollywood, April 30.

Newest fad among Hollywood stars seems to be to get themselves into the travel-film type of picture, either on the tv production side, or in cameos, or both.

Typical example is the one-hour tv special "Carib Adventure," just filmed by Bill Burrud and Victor Jory under the banner of their recently formed B & J Productions. Among stars doing bits are Nick Adams, Leon Ames, Dana Andrews, Sammy Davis Jr., Clint Walker, Lloyd Nolan—who also worked on the picture as a director—Cesar Romero, Richard Egan and Ricardo Montalban. Burrud and Jory appear, too, as well as having coproduced.

Manner in which Sammy Davis Jr. got into the act typifies the stars' interest in travel-adventure pix. Burrud and Jory were doing location shooting on a beach at the Virgin Islands when Davis wandered by. He promptly asked in, and the producers ad libbed a number of sequences for him on the spot.

In addition, Burrud now has a deal going for a new one-shot half-hour show with Fabian in which the singer would participate as co-producer and co-star. Also pending is a Burrud project filmed by Malcom Atterbury, veteran Hollywood character actor.

Names aren't limited to the acting field. Columnist Erskine Johnson recently completed a half-hour pic he did while touring foreign feature film locations. It is now being syndicated via Burrud's "True Adventure" series.

Some years ago Arthur Godfrey used travel films he took as the basis for one of his regular tv shows, and Jack Paar has done ditto this season, but the latest outbreak is by far the largest collection of name talent to hit the travel route cinematically.

SYNDIE LAMENT: NO HALF-HRS.

Crazy, Man

Cleveland, April 30.

Adults prefer kiddie shows; but the moppets go for such vehicles as "Combat," "Gallant Men," and "Ghoulardi"—the latter being an 11:25 p.m. shocker-film.

The above results came from a series of surveys conducted in six elementary schools by the Radio-TV Council of Greater Cleveland, and brought startled reaction from many educators.

Overwhelming was the indication that the children are not watching the programs designed for the youngsters, although the parents seem to enjoy such vehicles as "Bullwinkle."

At Ridge-Brook-Elementary School in suburban Parma, results of the survey among the 1,300 students showed such an overwhelming preference for "Combat" that the school's principal, Miss Dorothy Holmes told the Plain Dealers' radio-tv writer Terry Considine "I now have the answers to several school problems. One, we have been having gangs of 'Germans' and 'Americans' on our playgrounds at noon. Two, we have many more children feeling Germans are bad. Three, we have other children who want to grow up to be soldiers so they can shoot and kill."

Miss Holmes also wrote to parents asking "Is this what you want for your children? Do you think a program as exciting as this one is a good one to send elementary school children off to bed on? What thoughts must be dancing through their heads." (Combat: Tuesday, 7:30 p.m.).

Miss Holmes and other educators also noted the popularity of "Ghoulardi" and asked why parents permit their children to stay up to see a program starting at 11:25 p.m.

Hanna-Barbera's $3,000,000 Prod. Budget Triggers Major Expansion

Hollywood, April 30.

A record $3,000,000 in production has been budgeted by Hanna-Barbera Productions for the coming year, as it embarks on an expansion program marked by a diversification of the company's activities. Six-year-old animation company moves on May 1 to its new $1,200,000 building on a strip of land on the inbound San Fernando Valley-Hollywood freeway.

Proxy Joe Barbera and his partner, Bill Hanna, who founded the company in 1957, stressed the production figure is for firm commitments and a minimum, inasmuch as other deals are currently in negotiation.

On H-B's production agenda for the ensuing year are 26 "The Flintstones" cartoon episodes (on ABC-TV), overall budget $1,600,000; 156 five-minute syndicated shorts, $1,-200,000; a "Yogi Bear" feature film, $1,200,000; two half-hour industrial films, $400,000; 26 theatrical film shorts for Columbia release, $700,000; a live-action feature, "Father Was a Robot," $1,-500,000.

H-B's new leq, which has 40,000 square feet of space, will house all of its activities, such as animation, recording, music, dubbing commercials, etc. It was designed by Arthur Froelich, and its basement is also a bomb shelter.

Company's half-hour industrial films are being done for Mutual Fund of America and Warner-Lambert Pharmaceutical. Its Theatrical film shorts for Col consist of "Loopy de Loop," "Hillbilly Hawk"

McCarthy Jaunt: Freer TV Trade

On a mission to secure freer trade in tv programs, John G. McCarthy, proxy of Television Program Export Assn., has left for Geneva where he is scheduled to confer with John Evans, U.S. Minister to GATT negotiations.

These meetings are preliminary to formal hearings by the 37-nation membership of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade on the subject of freedom of international trade in tv programs. McCarthy reportedly has with him a mandate of specifics from his full membership with whom he met just before leaving.

From Switzerland, McCarthy will go to Malmo to continue a selling job for U.S. programmers with officials of the second German network. He also will go to London to protect provisions in a new television bill, now before Parliament, which, in the view of McCarthy could make it worse for American programmers selling in England.

Patricelli's WTIC Nod

Hartford, April 30.

Leonard J. Patricelli, v.p. of Travelers Broadcasting Service Corp. in charge of television programs, has been upped to post of general manager of the company, position left vacant by recent death of Walter C. Johnson, who died on April 16.

Robert S. Tyrol has been tagged secretary and director of the corporation to succeed Johnson in that role. Prior an assistant secretary, Tyrol holds post also as veepee in charge of radio sales. He is currently prexy of Connecticut Broadcasters Assn.

TBBC operates WTIC-AM, FM,-TV.

Heiss in Blast At 'Greedy' B'casters Axing Good Shows

Milwaukee, April 30.

Robert J. Heiss, manager of WTMJ-TV here, blasted tv station operators "impelled by greed for greater profits" for damaging the image of the industry. Heiss spoke on "What's Right With TV," at a local men's club meeting. He said:

"Some stations, impelled by greed for greater profits, and other stations, motivated by the more laudable desire merely to avoid financial collapse, will frequently drop outstanding network presentations of serious subjects and substitute less meaty fare designed for the mass audience.

"These stations," he said, "narrow television's dimensions in their own communities and do serious damage to the industry image everywhere. It is this type of operator which has caused the castigation of the industry by Mr. Minow and others in government."

Television cannot and should not be expected to program "too far in advance of the public," or over their heads, Heiss said. "We cannot," he said, "as some seem to think, change the face of televi-

Greenlight for Moline

Moline Television Corp., headed by Frank P. Schreiber, was given the greenlight last week to proceed with WQAD-TV, a new station in Moline, Ill. FCC's okay of the channel to Moline was upheld by the Federal court after being challenged by other applicants.

WQAD-TV will be an ABC-TV affil when it starts operations Aug. 1.

BUT PLENITUDE OF 60-MIN. SEGS

Product supply in off-network syndication now has turned a full cycle, with a comparative plenitude of fresh hourlong series and a relative scarcity of new half-hour product.

Oddly enough, the switch has come when stations remain nearly as tight as ever in their local time availabilities. Dictating the rise of the hourlong series over the half-hours in the product pool is the continued popularity of the hour form on the three networks.

A look at next season's networks schedules portends that for a few syndication seasons hence what has happened in '62, the rise of the hourlong form over the half-hour in the off - network syndication pool, will continue years hence.

Contributing to the comparative off-network half-hour scarcity are these factors: Some of the "hot" off-network 30 minutes are grabbed by the networks for a daytime or Saturday a.m. rerun. Witness "Dennis the Menace" slated for a Saturday a.m. ride on ABC-TV; CBS-TV inking for daytime stripping of Andy Griffith and Jack Benny. Producer-distributors seek the network daytime run for a hot property over immediate syndication because the network ride usually will offer $15,000 per episode. Thereafter, in syndication, extra dollars can be milked for the property.

Another factor is that unless a series wins a two-year ride on the network, its likelihood of succeeding in syndication, winning sufficient sales to pay off residuals and return a profit, are slim. There are exceptions to this rule of thumb, with the Jackie Gleason "Honeymooners" standing out as a prime example. Yet, the syndicator who takes on a network turkey finds he's usually dealing in continued losses.

How limited the off-network half-hour product pool now is can be gleaned from the major 30-minuters now being offered. They include, among the comparative newcomers, "Have Gun Will Travel," CBS Films; "Rifleman," Four Star Films; "Leave It to Beaver," MCA TV; and "Dobie Gillis," 20th-Fox. In addition, Four Star has Tom Ewell, 32 episodes; and "The Detectives," which Four Star has doctored with bridges so that it can be played in a half-hour, as well as in an hour form.

MCA-TV, with the addition of "Beaver," now has what it calls a "fun, family bloc" of shows, all in the half-hour form. The others being "Bachelor Father" and "Love That Bob."

CBS Films in marketing "HGWT" is making deals on a one-a-week telecast basis. Four Star, which has more episodes in "Rifleman," is distributing the series for stripping by stations.

It's more than of passing interest to note that there are no fresh half-hour off-network entries either in the action-adventure or anthology categories. For a long time, action-adventure was the staple in syndication, both in the first-run and off-network fields. That form seems to have dried up on the networks, a development now reflected in syndication. Same, to a lesser extent, applies to anthologies.

Coming to the aid of this comparative scarcity in the half-hour field are the backlog of product in the syndicators' catalog and the few first-run syndication entries. It's generally acknowledged that stations need fresh product in the 30-minute form, for no matter how the station's schedule is juggled to accommodate the off-network hours, there's always an open slot only of 30 minutes.

Right now a comparative handful of entries are vieing to fill those 30 open minutes on local stations. Outlook for the future is that the handful of fresh off-network entries won't grow markedly.

Collins Challenges 'Wrath of Roth', Berates Texas Rebels' 'Self-Benefit' In Fla. 'Declaration of Conscience'

Doerfer's New Job

Washington, April 30.

The Maryland-D.C. Broadcasters' Assn., made up of stations operating where politicians work and play, has engaged a new general counsel: John C. Doerfer, the former FCC chairman who suffered the pain of the political guillotine.

Doerfer resigned the FCC chairmanship after an Oren Harris Subcommittee expose. The group headed by Rep. Harris (D.-Ark.) discovered Doerfer had been vacationing in Florida waters on the yacht of George B. Storer, who owns a chain of broadcasting stations subject to FCC regulation.

With the Maryland-D.C. Assn., Doerfer will have the joint title of general counsel and executive secretary.

1st Half Off But 4 Star Envisions Same $1.20 on Yr.

Four Star Television reported a net income for the first half of the current fiscal year of $187,117, equal to 31 cents a share based on the 601,250 common shares outstanding at Dec. 29, 1962.

This compares to a net income of $367,471 or 60 cents a share, for the first half of the previous fiscal year, based on the $11,250 shares outstanding at Dec. 30, '61.

For the entire fiscal year, prexy Thomas J. McDermott in an interim report to stockholders, said that earnings should compare favorably with the $1.20 earnings per share registered in the '61-'62 fiscal year. He said that the ? ? ? ? predicted $1.20 earnings would include substantial writeoffs and a special credit.

In the latter half of the current fiscal year Four Star received a tax free payment of $500,000 from a company-held insurance policy on the life of Dick Powell, late chairman and one of the company's founders.

In the first half of the current fiscal year, the 26 weeks ended Dec. 29, '62, gross income increased to $11,776,321 from the $9,939,751 registered in the comparable year ago period. Increase stemmed principally from syndication sales made in the period under review.

In the first half of the current fiscal year, a substantial writeoff of costs incurred in the development of a number of properties and pilot films over the last few years, as well as higher amortization costs, decreased net income from the comparable year ago period, according to Four Star.

Company stated that writeoffs are being taken in equal parts in each of the two halves of the current fiscal year. Operating, selling and administrative expenses in the first half of the year also reflect large charges as costs of distribution and residual payments are applied against initial syndication sales.

Russ Columbo TV Bio

San Francisco, April 30.

The new industrial-tv film production company started by Lee Mendelson here is working up a bio on Russ Columbo with another singer, Johnny Desmond, as host-narrator.

Mendelson says he's also preparing a documentary re the Central Pacific R.R., based on Lucius Beebe's book about the CP and the Southern Pacific R.R.s.

Mendelson was a KPIX staff producer.

Washington, April 30.

With strains of "The Eyes of Texas Are Upon You" stinging in his ears, NAB prexy LeRoy Collins issued a rallying cry for broadcasters "who believed in something beyond self-benefit."

Faced with an incipient secessionist move by Jack Roth of the Texas Assn. of Broadcasters, Collins called for support from those willing to follow him on the harder course of self-improvement and self-regulation.

Colling warned of the many and strong voices "that would detract and deter us" from the course of self-improvement and self-regulation.

"But every great business—every great profession — every great nation," he said, "was built the hard way by people who believed in something beyond self-benefit."

Collins said it wasn't his job to provide an escape from the realities of life and bluntly asked "how can individual responsible broadcasters see to it that their profession as a whole does meet its public responsibilities" and thus not lose their freedom to government regulation.

He said a business association can "no longer behave as though it were in existence solely to siphon as much material gain from the society as it can get for its members."

Collins returned to his native Florida in the attempt to put down the second Dixie drive for independence. In a speech to the Advertising Federation of America in Orlando, Collins said a group is most effective in serving its individual members interests by kindling the fires of professional character and greatness while providing "insulation against the ever reaching effort of government on the prowl for vacuums of unmet public needs."

Collins' message was clear and the willingness to do battle was evident. The speech, though, was given from his seemingly favorite platform—the tightrope—and thus

30 Producers On Revue TV Payroll

Hollywood, April 30.

Revue Studios, which recently launched a drive to sign vidpix producers for its 16 series next season as well as on new pilot projects, has 30 producers on its payroll—far more than any other studio in Hollywood, theatrical film or tv.

By way of comparison, MGM-TV, second to Revue in vidpix production with six series set for next semester, has a dozen producers on its staff.

Revue's figure, probably a record, includes a number of hyphenates—producer-directors and producer-writers. Studio has a policy of assigning several producers to some of its series, such as "The Virginian," "Alfred Hitchcock Hour," and "Kraft '64." In addition, some of the producers aligned with Revue are not working on series per se, but are involved in spinoffs and other pilot situations.

Alan J. Miller is production veepee for the valley tv lot. Producers on the Revue staff (some of them exec producers) are Richard Irving, Roy Huggins, Howard Christy, Stanley Rubin, Jack Laird, Stanley Niss, Don Siegel, David Rich, Jules Schermer, Joel Rogosin (assistant to Huggins), Frank Telford, Dick Berg, Frank P. Rosenberg.

THE BEST IS YET TO BE

Winning six of the distinguished George Foster Peabody Awards for 1963—just after a public vote honored us with six of the season's eight TV Guide Awards—makes NBC feel extremely proud. We'd say it was pretty fair substantiation that a network's programming—if sufficiently versatile and creative—can be honored for excellence by a specialized panel of judges and also be prized by the mass of the nation's viewers. A mere glance at NBC's Peabody Award recipients pictured here will show how well the winners span the full range of broadcasting's news, information and entertainment. Our warmest thanks to all those talented men and women who had a part in preparing these prize-winning programs. And our very deep appreciation to the Peabody Awards Committee*, whose valued accolades —in both radio and television—have contributed so much through the years to broadcasting's excellence.

Now, our attention is turned to next season's programs, for here at NBC we shall always feel that..."the best is yet to be."

Look to NBC for the best combination of news, information and entertainment.

Hammer Predicts Lotsa Big Money Prime Time Quiz Shows in Offing

Big money quiz shows will be back in force on the networks with as many as six running in primetime within the next nine months, says quiz producer Jerry Hammer, whose "Camouflage" had a two-year post-quiz scramble run on ABC-TV daytime.

Cued by ABC's "100 Grand," the big loot quizmers will "catch on like fever," says Hammer, who figures it will be very interesting to see how long CBS' $200 prize limit lasts if the ABC big money revival is a success.

Hammer has received reports on the format of "100 Grand," as yet unrevealed by the network, and from what he's heard, he feels it is basically a good idea. He says, however, the web is "very brave" to be stepping out with the show, and he's sure they've got "lotsa headaches" getting into shape.

Report is that the show will pit an expert against a novice in q. and a.'s on the subjects familiar to the pre-scandal big-money quizzers—opera, baseball, Bible, cooking, etc. Touted "rig-proof" angle to the show is that the expert and the novice will make up the questions and try to stump one another. Expert's home town will in some way benefit if he wins. The novice will take home any winnings himself, and can win as much as $25,000 a week, or hit the 100 grand jackpot in three weeks. If he flubs, however, he gets only a consolation prize.

NAB May Set Up A Program Dept.

Washington, April 30.

National Assn. of Broadcasters is looking into the possibility of establishing a program department.

NAB prexy Le Roy Collins appointed a six-man committee to study the feasibility of a program office.

Collins said the department, if initiated, would "serve as a central source of program information and ideas which have proven successful."

While the individual station must take greater responsibility in creative programming, Collins continued, the envisaged department would "develop studies and aids to improve the expertise" of NAB member stations.

Appointees to the committee which will hold its first meeting May 2 are: co-chairman Joseph Bentley, Westinghouse Broadcasting Co., Washington and Allen Page, KWGA, Enid, Okla., and members John F. Dille, Truth Broadcasting Co., Elkhart, Ind.; Harold Essex, WSJS, Winston-Salem, N.C.; Eugene Thomas, KETV, Omaha, Neb. and Cecil Woodland, WEJL, Scranton, Pa.

CBS-TV Ups Tillmanns

Carl Tillmanns has moved into the spot as v.p. and general sales manager of CBS-TV, the post vacated by Thomas Dawson, when he moved up as v.p. in charge of sales.

Series of moves was dictated by the resignation of sales senior v.p. Bill Hylan, who joined J. Walter Thompson.

Tillmanns had been v.p. of eastern sales, a post now vacant. He joined CBS-TV's sales department as an account exec in December, '59. Previously he had been with NBC-TV sales for five years.

Wolper Series On NBC Designed For Big H'wood Promo

Hollywood, April 30.

Following the recent spate of television documentary specials pointing to the downgrade of Hollywood, David Wolper pledges "promotion to show the motion picture industry with stature and tradition" in a "positive" approach toward the film capital now being prepared for his NBC series of 26 documentary "specials" under the tags "The Hollywood Story."

Wolper, who has budgeted $2,000,000 for the shows, which begin Sept. 28 on 8:30-10 p.m. Monday night timeslot, said he will show how Hollywood has functioned in past, present and what it looks to in the future in a group of six categories aimed at selling and promoting Hollywood on both a personal and professional level.

Using both film clips of recognized classics, newsreel footage, stills and privately-owned films, the series will cover the areas: "Life Stories of Individual Stars," "Successful Film Cycles" (western, gangster films, musicals) "The Great Moviemakers," "Star Types" (The love goddesses, great lovers,

Judy Changes Mind, Now Coast Origination

Next season's "Judy Garland Show" on CBS-TV will originate from the Coast, instead of N. Y., as originally planned.

Switch was dictated by the personal wishes of the star. This gives the Coast another major weekly variety hour, the others on CBS-TV being Danny Kaye, and Red Skelton.

All the production people, hired with N. Y. in mind, will make the switch. They include producer George Schlatter, director Bill Hobin and scenic designer Gary Smith. Johnny Bradford has been tabbed as head waiter.

100% TURNOVER ON AUDIMETERS

By BILL GREELEY

A. C. Nielsen Co. will have a 100% turnover of its current 1,200 audimeter tv rating homes by spring of 1966. Thus spoke Arthur C. Nielsen Jr. last week in three days of Summit (Hotel) meetings in New York attended by about 400 ad agency and client execs.

The meetings, exclusive to subscribers, were called in the wake of the Oren Harris Congressional subcommittee hearings [illegible] cent ratings which have shaken industry and public [illegible] all-important numbers.

In a presentation called "Nielsen Commentary on Major Focus Items Growing Out of the Harris Hearings," Nielsen made what one ad exec called a "point-by-point" refutation of important charges and disclosures arising out of the three-week Congressional outing.

On the "item" of "sample aging," the rating exec said, "Our immediate target is the forced turnover of approximately 100 households by fall '63, to correct the Age of Head-Household bias in the present audimeter sample." He added that those homes that had been contacted by representatives of the Harris committee would now be excluded from NRI-NTI reports, and all would be replaced as soon as practical.

After the first 100 revisions, the company's complete turnover plan calls for (cumulative) 200 new homes by spring of '64; 375 new homes by spring '65; 515 new homes by spring '66; 1,050 new homes by spring of '67; and 1,200 by spring of '68.

The ratings exec said the revisions would be made at "a price to be quoted," which would indicate an increase in price of the service to agencies and advertisers in follow-up of the already proposed 30% increase to stations.

And, he said, the company also plans to continue with a complete turnover of homes at five-year intervals after 1968.

In another plan — subject to client approval of spending more money — Nielsen proposed sampling the Mountain Time Zone, heretofore lumped with the Pacific Time Zone sample "for economic reasons." He said that the Mountain Time Zone homes had been placed in the Pacific area, permitting reporting of the Pacific Time Zone as a "market division."

An alternative to including Mountain Time falls in the national rating, he proposed, "would be sampling the PTZ at normal 15% of the population," in lieu of present over-sampling (via inclusion of MTZ homes); or, "combine the MTZ and PTZ for reporting time-zone market sections (in lieu of reporting the over-sample PTZ)." Price: "To be quoted."

Other "items" re Harris discussed at the Summit sessions included:

Clustering—"There are two situations in the 1,200 home audimeter sample—one in Georgia, one in Oklahoma—in which a pair of homes are in the same block. These situations resulted from observing normal sampling procedures, as can be discussed in detail."

Long-tuning (no dial-change) intervals—"Analysis of the audimeter sample discloses that tuning intervals in excess of 24 hours are in the extreme minority—comprising less than 1% of the tuning-minutes for radio and of the order of 0.1% of the tuning minutes for tv" (no mention here of the percentage of tuning intervals under 24 hours, such as 23, 22, 21, etc) . . . "Take are being run for additional weeks and will be supplied to clients in the near future."

Improper influence of sample homes—"We have taken vigorous action to combat locating and contacting Nielsen homes. And it has been (and will continue to be) our policy to replace homes known to be identified by interested third parties.

"Our experience indicates that

How Many This-Is-It Crises Shows Can Public Digest? TV Documentary Makers in Quest of New Trails

By BERN SCHOENFELD

Impressed by the research statistics which indicate that the masses couldn't care less and depressed by the fact that highbrow viewers aren't viewing, television documentaries are searching for a bright, new peg on which to hang their projects during the upcoming season. The general aim of the documentary makers is to eliminate their subsidized status stemming from their inability to deliver large enough audiences to pay for the basic programming costs.

Already visible on the horizon is a switch by the documentarians to junior themes with a more showmanship attack. As reflected in the thinking of John Secondari, chief of ABC-TV's special projects division, television documentaries will henceforth strive to reach the people, rather than the critics, with ideas, events and problems that are translatable into personal significance.

"The history of television documentaries," Secondari stated, "has taught the mass audience that they cannot expect more than a heavy treatment of something that is good for them." Hence, documentaries have been shunned like a form of intellectual medicine by those who need it most.

Beyond the ponderous treatment, however, is the fact that the three tv networks have tended to duplicate each other in turning out shows on such critical areas as race relations, Cuba, Berlin, Africa, etc. "That is unavoidable," Secondari pointed out, "because we all live in the same world, have had the same training and more or less share the same viewpoint." But how many this-is-it crises shows can the public digest?

The time has come, Secondari said, to explore new trails in reality shows. He indicated that many of the current-style public affairs programming would be handled as hard news specials to free the

Sudkin' With Sorkin

Chicago, April 30.

It's now open season on the rating-companies. The following is copy from a display ad purchased in the Chicago dailies by radio station WCFL:

"The A. C. Nielsen Radio Survey Co. says that the Dan Sorkin Morning Show heard weekly mornings on WCFL has 90-Admirable Listeners!

"We want to know: Who writes Dan's remarkable fan mail? Who buys the products and services Dan sells each morning? Who are the thousands of people wearing Rose Bimler buttons (reference is to a Sorkin stunt)? Why are the clients who sponsor Dan's show satisfied? Why did Newsweek devote their entire radio-tv section to the Dan Sorkin Show in the March 25th issue? Why is Chicago's most talked about personality unmeasurable?

"Who's putting us on?"

Say Whammy Put On WAME Ratings, Sue Pulse, Nielsen

Miami, April 30.

Following the recent Congressional subcommittee probe into methods and operation of the rating services, indie station WAME this week filed suits in Dade County Circuit Court in sums of $250,000 against Pulse, Inc. and A. C. Nielsen, Inc., for estimated loss of revenue" because of ratings given the outlet by the services over a span of four years.

Owners-operators of WAME, Leon and Ted Wilson (father and son team) through their attorney Irving Whitman will also ask the court to determine punitive damages in each case. The suits will allege that WAME lost revenues by a "victim of misrepresented and fraudulent audience surveys" made by the two firms.

One of the first reps of a radio station to testify before the House committee was WAME general manager Murray Werner, some six weeks ago. Werner told the investigating group that until their probe was started there had been hesitancy on the part of his station (and others) to cancel subscriptions to the rating services.

The legal action by WAME may be the first of its kind to be instituted in the industry.

White House Military Reception as Special; Maybe as Pilot, Too

NBC News has decided, in effect, to make a pilot program, and the format is White House receptions. Tomorrow (Thurs.) evening at 7:30, the news department will offer a one-hour tv program covering the Military Reception to be given by President John F. Kennedy.

The Reception, for over 200 Medal of Honor winners and some high military brass, begins at 6 p.m. and ends at 8. NBC will tape it and arrange the tape so that it can begin a half-hour before the festivities end. There'll be marching on the White House lawn and other ceremonies. Apart from whatever news value the event has, NBC News is trying to figure out whether it'll excite enough interest so that coverage of later Kennedy receptions might be planned.

Gitlin Won't Get, Stickin' With NBC

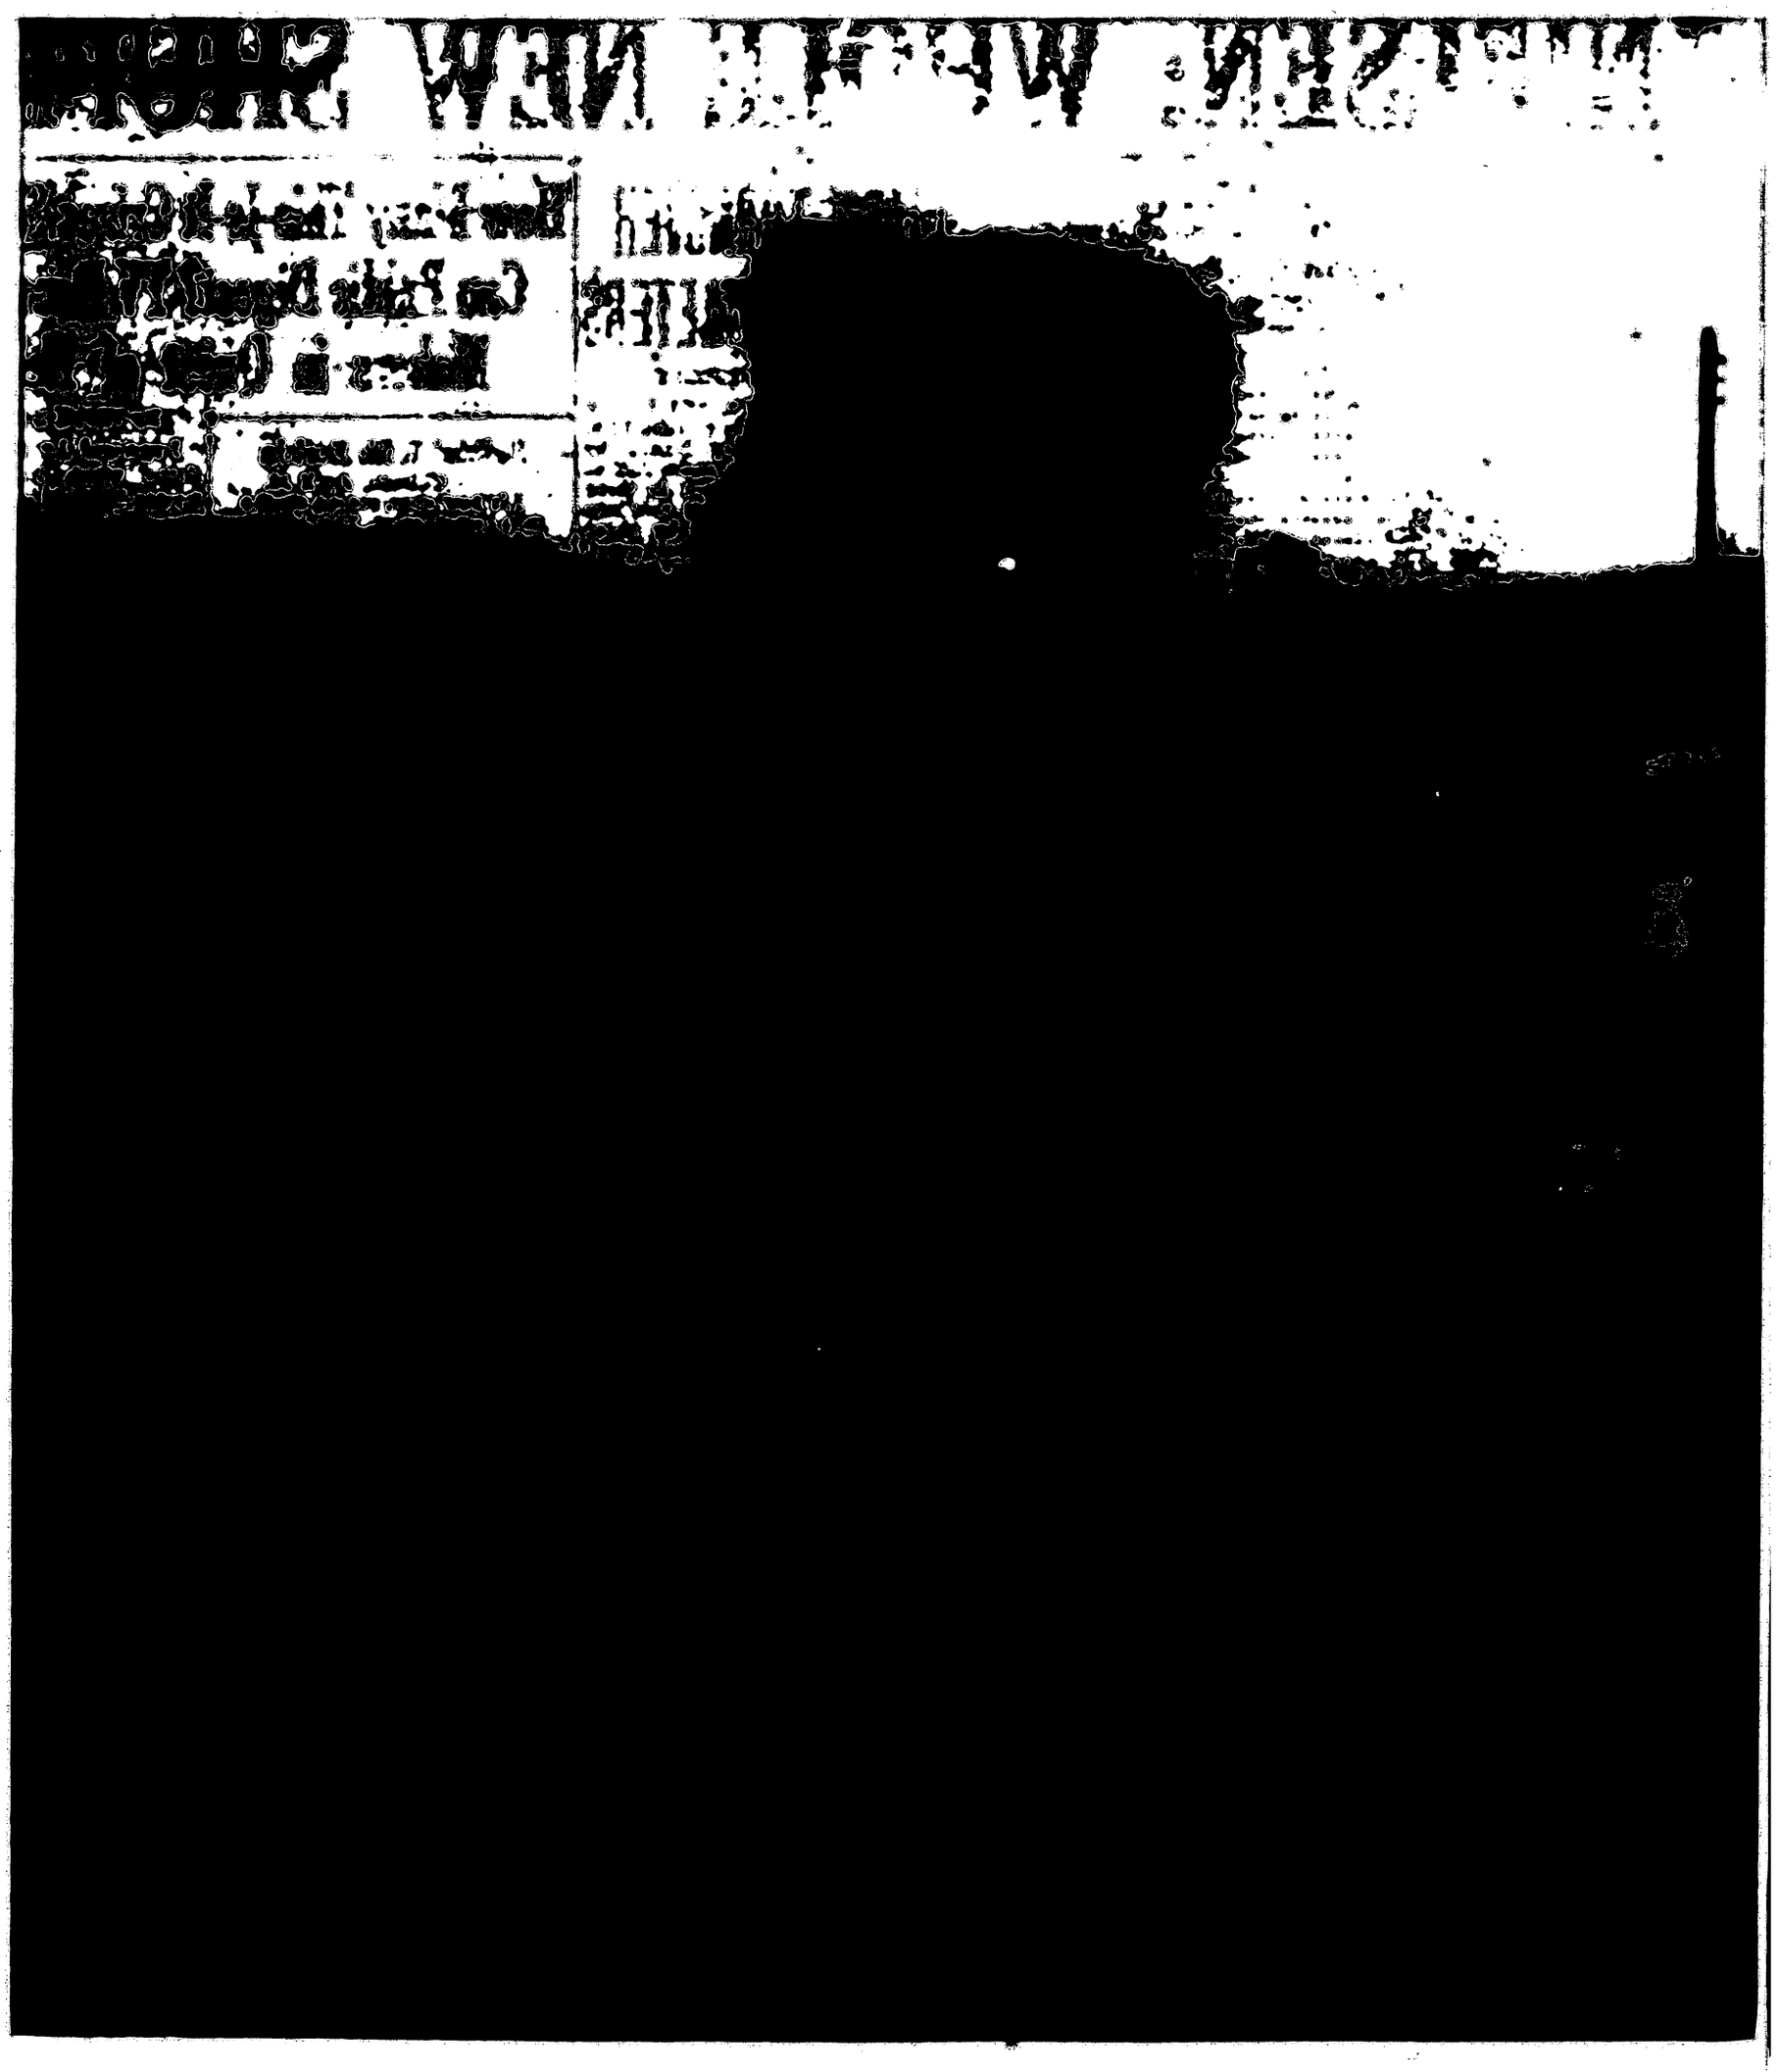
Irving Gitlin will be back next fall at NBC News, unless something unexpected and untoward happens in the next few days. He has already been publicly listed as one of the three contributing forces to the '63-'64 DuPont Sunday night skein.

For literally months, Gitlin and NBC News have been dickering a renewal of his original two-year contract. Late last week, they were down to one or two contractual points, one of the points purportedly term of contract. But, as somebody said, "It must have been okay because everybody is smiling."

Gitlin will continue as head of NBC News' creative projects unit, which includes producers and directors Fred Freed, Al Wasserman, Art Zigart. The group is going to do six one-hour "drama-documentaries," a Gitlin term for describing the format Creative Projects used last week in doing "Prisoner At Large," the story of a Boston parole officer and parolee.

DuPont has also commissioned the Franklin Schaffner - Fielder Cooke Directors Co. to produce seven hour-long dramas on the NBC slanza next season and seven dramas from David Susskind's TA-Paramount unit.

At present, the pattern for DuPont next season is 20 first-runs and 10 repeats. There is the possibility, with the help of agency BBDO, that the pattern'll change to 22 new and eight repeats. If this happens, field is wide open now as to who gets the other two.



Molding of a Marine

Give a 24-year-old Marine officer his first command, and you have a man with problems, even in peacetime. If the man is as sensitive as he is devoted to his job, you have the makings of standout television drama.

We thought so much of the idea, we told it to the Marines — at Camp Pendleton, California. They agreed to use of the base as background, and even assigned a Navy Cross-winning officer as our technical adviser. The result is "The Lieutenant," an authentic new series that becomes part of NBC-TV's wide-ranging schedule this Fall.

The young officer in question is Bill Rice (played by Gary Lockwood), toughened by four years of training at Quantico, but modest enough to know that gold bars do not a lieutenant make.

How he proves himself on duty — in such situations as a night of rugged shore patrol, a brainwash experiment, and the handling of a rebellious recruit who happens to be a close friend—involves no stereotyped heroics, and wins him no medals. But it will, we think, win viewers by the million.

(How he proves himself off-duty is a winning story, too. With a young officer as handsome as this, it's a rare girl who has no time for lieutenants).

Gary Lockwood, an acting protege of Elia Kazan and Joshua Logan, earns his starring assignment after impressive performances in Hollywood's "Splendor in the Grass," and Broadway's "There Was a Little Girl." The rigors of Marine camp life should hold no anxiety for Lockwood, a former movie stunt man and star college athlete. Lest anyone feel we had to summon the Marines, may we add that "The Lieutenant" is only one of a diversified span of programs helping to make the upcoming season the most exciting in NBC history.

Satellite Shows 'Just Gimmicks'

Denver, April 30.

An official of the National Assn. of Educational Broadcasters says the broadcasting of live educational tv programs around the world by communications satellites would be impractical and unrealistic anytime in the foreseeable future.

Because of the overwhelming technical difficulties and the prohibitive cost, Vernon Bronson, director of research and development for the Washington, D.C. organization, said that satellites will not be used to spread education throughout the world for a good number of years.

Bronson was in town to address the national convention of the Associated State Boards of Education.

Bronson doesn't believe that commercial tv shows on satellites would be a very practical thing in the near future. It was his opinion that the video shows relayed from London to Paris to the U. S. after Telstar went into orbit "were just gimmicks to prove it could be done."

The immediate future will see communications satellites used primarily for relaying telegrams, long distance telephone calls and transmitting other data, he said. "By 1980, the number of messages transmitted across the Atlantic from the United States is expected to increase at least 25 times. That means that most of these messages will have to be sent via satellite. Satellite communications will be jammed. There just won't be room for relaying tv programs, let alone educational tv programs."

Bronson said there is very little ETV material that is so critical it can't wait 12 or 14 hours to be delivered overseas by jet.

'CBS Reports' Steals A Fole-Through On Cigaret-Cancer Story

"CBS Reports" exec producer Fred Friendly has a return engagement upcoming with the running cigaret-cancer story.

When the U.S. Surgeon General's report comes out, perhaps in June or soon thereafter, "CBS Reports" is preparing to do an hour-long telementary on the findings of the report, the sentiment of consultant committee members, etc.

Feeling is that "CBS Reports" in its first installment raised and examined the issue on nationwide television, and a follow through, keyed and timed to the report of the U.S. Surgeon General, is a logical additional chapter. Tobacco Institute of America squawked about "CBS Reports" documentary earlier this season. (Tobacco companies spend about $140,000,000 in network tv.)

ABC-TV'S SUMMER SUN. NITE REVAMP

ABC-TV is extensively revamping its Sunday night summer lineup as a result of the departure of "The Voice of Firestone" and the Howard K. Smith show starting June 16. The Hollywood features, now scheduled from 8 to 10 p.m., will start at 8:30 p.m. "Jane Wyman Presents," a daytime show on the web, has been penciled in for 8 p.m. At 10:30 p.m., the news department is taking over the Smith segment for a half-hour weekly news roundup and analysis.

On Tuesday nights at 10:30 p.m. during the summer, ABC-TV will carry "Focus on America," the best of documentaries produced locally by the web affiliates. On Monday nights at 8:30 p.m., "Rifleman" again departs for the summer with P&G, owner of the time period, bringing in a comedy show, "Funny, Funny Movies."

2 ABC Welper Specials To Get CBS Repeats

In a strange switch, CBS-TV will carry the repeats of two David Welper specials on Hollywood, telecast the first time around earlier this season by ABC-TV.

Procter & Gamble, which has two plays on the specials, brought them over to CBS-TV for a nighttime rerun ride on Aug. 7 and Sept. 3. Two specials are "Hollywood: The Fabulous Era", and "Hollywood: The Great Stars."

MENTAL HEALTH FACETS SIFTED

Psychiatrists and broadcasters got together last week at an out-of-New York country hotel for some quite self-analysis of their mutual problems, with therapeutic benefits, for all concerned. While the sessions were billed under the general tag of "Conference on Broadcasting and Mental Health," it was no secret to anybody's analyst that these intensive meetings were in fact cued by the recent controversy over that NBC dramatic series "Eleventh Hour" which deals in fiction fashion with psychiatry and psychiatrists.

Sparked by the National Association for Mental Health, and sponsored jointly by the NAMH and the NAB, the two-day meeting brought together for frank and open talk some of the nation's leading psychiatrists, psychologists, radio and television broadcasters.

Hollywood tv film producers, many of them with a stake in the drama of trauma, were very much in evidence, among them Norman Felton of MGM-TV, George Lefferts of Bing Crosby Productions, William Dozier of Screen Gems, and Louis Edelman of Marterie Enterprises. Goodson-Todman also sent a representative in the person of their executive vp, Harold Austin.

Network reps included Grace Johnson, head of continuity acceptance for ABC, George Heinemann, MBC Public Affairs Manager, Louis Hausman, NBC vp; Carl Watson, continuity acceptance head for NBC, Herbert Carlberg, Director of Program Practices for CBS, and CBS vp, Joseph Ream.

Keynote of the conference was sounded by Dr. William C. Menninger, head of the Menninger Foundation, who stressed great power of tv and radio, praised their contributions generally, and called for broadcasters to do even more to educate the public on the whole range of mental health problems, not just mental illness, vital as that is, but, as Dr. Menninger put it, "everything from mental retardation to tension headaches, to industrial mental health problems."

"There is need," he emphasized, "for good will on both sides, broadcasters and psychiatrists, and we are here to exchange views on mental health and mental illness."

'Long Overdue'

Stockton Helffrich, manager of the New York Code Office of the NAB, sounded a similar note in his address, pointing out that "this is a session long overdue. Goodwill abounds among us, broadcasters and psychiatrists, and it's up to us to block out a mutual discipline."

After the constructive theme voiced by Dr. Menninger and Helffrich, the sessions for the first day, however, focused largely—too much in opinion of some of the broadcasters in attendance — on the issue of "The Eleventh Hour," and the on-screen 'endorsement' given to that series by an official committee of the American Medical Association. For a while, it appeared as if the broadcasters and the producers were caught in what several termed "a jurisdictional dispute," a cross-fire between various groups within the medical profession.

It was evident that most of the psychiatrists, as represented by their American Psychiatric Association, whose representatives were on hand, too, were and are firmly against any official on-screen endorsement actual or even implied, of any television program or series, especially a so-called entertainment show.

As one of the small group sessions into which the Conference broke down for working purposes put it into its formal report to the over-all Conference: "The general feeling, especially on the part of the professional people, seemed to be that this type of accreditation (that is, such as the AMA gave to the "Eleventh Hour") from a professional organization was out of place on a program or series designed primarily for entertainment

Lew Grade's 'Big 6' ATV Dramas Enlist Top Writers & Directors

London, April 30

ATV topper Lew Grade today (Tues.) released details of his company's most ambitious drama project to date which will involve 12 of the top writing and directing talents in the U.K. matched into working pairs to produce six new hour-long plays for ATV's new year Sunday night drama slot.

No budgets were mentioned, the project has not even a collective title nor a common theme. But Grade was certain that by virtue of the policy of giving these talents their heads with regard to prepping time, casting and subject matter the outcome would be close to establishing a new high in contemporary tv drama.

"The object of the project is not simply to be lavish with money", Grade's overall script editor Stella Richman explained. 'Any reasonably competent idiot can turn out passable programs with $80,000 or $90,000 to play around with. What we are offering is something quite revolutionary for tv drama in Britain, a minimum of four days' studio rehearsal in our Elstree studios, among the finest and most modern in the world and before that unlimited preparation time and a free hand on subject matter within the confines of the decency regulations of the Independent Television Authority."

ATV has matched six pairs of talents, writer-director, and given them each nine months to come up with an hour drama. Two are already shedded for their final four days' studio rehearsal, one in July the other August. They will then be taped for transmission beginning January.

Donald McWhinnie, who staged the original version of "The Caretaker" and after 20 years with BBC radio drama has done his first tv for ATV—is directing a new What's With Don Sharpe?

Hollywood, April 30.

Considerable mystery shrouds position of Don Sharpe at GAC-TV—is he still prexy? No one at the agency could be pinned down, but there were varying versions of the status of Sharpe, who has been in negotiations with board chairman Herbert Siegel to obtain a release from his contract.

Callers were told "Mr. Sharpe is no longer with us." However, GAC Coast veepee Martin Baum was more cautious, saying simply that Sharpe was "not on the premises." Baum added since negotiations anent a release were being handled by Siegel, he didn't know anything about them.

Sharpe is now headquartered at Desilu Gower. He had asked for his release so he could concentrate on representation of Lucille Ball and "The Lucy Show." He has repped Miss Ball for 15 years. It's reported Sharpe is now in London.

French TV News Re-Formatted, But Will It Be Freer?

Paris, April 30.

A new form of treating newscasts on the national one-channel video web went into effect this week. It was evolved via a sounding out of public opinion which seems to fit with President De Gaulle's preferences for referendums in making important governmental decisions or changes.

Alain Peyrefitte, Minister of Information, under whose aegis tv is via the Radiodiffusion Television Francaise, told the press about the new news attitudes himself. Main change is substituting much more actual images of events for straight commentary. Actual essay-like studies of a subject and debates were preferred to monologs by the public, according to Peyrefitte.

Thus the newscaster has become more a commentator and witness on and of events than just a straight deliverer of news handouts. It was made clear that tv would only report and not take sides on or about the events.

Above has been a sore point since the last few years many news shows have been censored and some even redone for governmental benefit. According to Peyrefitte the news will be honest and objective, which is the essence of tv newscasting and its mission. If the government wants a say it can send someone to do it in its name.

The lead 8 p.m. news outlet will be upped to 20 minutes with an emphasis on imagery over talk. Each event will get its proper length and treatment according to its importance, and the special programs will be made up on leading contemporary happenings and topics rather than on preconceived subjects as heretofore.

Raymond Marcillac will head this revved up news section seconded by a flock of newsmen. There will be more tieups with foreign networks (an accord is already set with CBS in the U. S.), a greater archive system and, above all, a greater leeway in news handling without too much bureaucratic interference. Or so it is now. It remains to be seen how it works out and whether French tv news will be freer and less hampered than of yore.

Agency Men and Sponsors Show Real Concern in Rating Disclosures - On Other Madison Ave. Fronts

If Madison Ave.'s public posture (trade press proclamations, etc.) has been a sort of "so what?" attitude toward the disclosures from the recent Congressional rating hearings, the shrug-and-shuff is not at all reflected in the action currently underway behind the scenes.

Deep concern over the state of broadcast audience measurement underlies the thinking by agency men and clients alike. In concert, the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies and the Association of National Advertisers are preparing moves that could effect corrective measures where necessary followed by a policing of ratings in the future.

The 4A's and ANA, most important associations in the industry, have established rating subcommittees in conjunction with their respective broadcast committees. A joint meeting of the broadcast committees was scheduled for last night (Tues.) to approve a letter framed by media execs (Jean Geiger, veepee and director of media research at Ted Bates, and Frank VandeVenter, of General Food's corporate marketing division) to be sent to the Advertising Research Foundation and the National Assn. of Broadcasters.

ARF has proposed an audit of rating services, and it's expected both the 4A's and ANA will approve some sort of audit system (meaning they are prepared to initially, at least, meet the request for industry support asked by ARF). NAB has made it clear that it would like to take the lead in any rating reforms that develop out of the hearings.

The letter framed by the 4A's and ANA rating subcommittees reportedly will ask for a thorough investigation of ratings as they stand, the idea being that an audit is all right, "but let's be sure what we're auditing is right to begin with."

Letter will take into consideration the rise of the computer in broadcast research and selection, and the necessity for accurate info to feed the machines.

No Help Me, Gwen Marvin

Trio program producers and salesmen making pitches along Madison Ave. have noted a definite change in the approach of agency media folk and show buyers. They may still use ratings as the basic and final criteria of decision, but they no longer like to talk about it.

As an example, one exec tells of the rough copy of an agency memo on a show that fell in him. It originally stated that "this show should reach 20,000,000 by homes." The 20,000,000, however, had been crossed out and edited to read, "a good audience."

Again, a VARIETY reporter asked an agency program chieftain if the rating pull was why his shop went for discreet special shows. The kidding-on-the-square reply was, "Please, we don't talk about ratings around here anymore."

Grimm's Take

John E. Grimm 3d, a company veepee, has been upped from marketing director of the household products division at Colgate-Palmolive to general manager of the toilet articles division.

Grimm replaces Edward Geisthorpe, who has resigned to take over the exec veepee post at Ocean Spray Cranberries.

Roll of TV Dice

hours will be cut in half (about 15 or so! Dinah Shore won't be around at all next season.

As for ABC, it's a "make or break" roll of the dice for Tom Moore. He's shooting out in all directions, hardly sticking to any particular form, and with a virtually brand new schedule in the most radical departure and upheaval yet attempted among the three networks. The range is wide —from the circus-mottled "Greatest Show On Earth," the "Arrest and Trial" bracketing of two 60-minute shows, to science fiction, to Jimmy Dean, to two hours of Jerry Lewis, to "Hootenanny" "Jamie MacPhatters" and an assortment of hour anthologies. But no old movies.

No one is venturing any predictions at this point. Based on the history of the business, the CBS lineup of the stars is hardly calculated to dim the lustre of that eye. NBC appears to have settled for that "middle ground" safety. ABC's is a daring gamble, equally compounded of guts and money.

Not until the October Nielsens are posted will the boys know for sure which two networks went the wrong way.

Welper Series

comedians) "Close-Ups of Movies-In-The Making" and "Human Interest Features."

Among subjects set in these categories is a show about Bette Davis, to use clips of her past film hits, new footage company will shoot and a promotional ending pointing to an upcoming Warner Bros. film, which will be done in form of a WB reunion for the star. Other tag titles and formats set are "Where Are They Now?" and "Hollywood, U.S.A.," a story about the town itself.

Welper, who will function as exec producer on series, which is the first independent documentary series ever to be done on any network, is now setting up meetings with the MPAA and studio execs to seek cooperation for the industry in gaining use of film material and personnel to be used in the series. He asks for cooperation from the industry to make the series "a dynamic, upbeat story about Hollywood that will help keep the American industry and its traditions alive and important in the entire world."

Jack Haley Jr., who produced the three Welper specials on Hollywood, which Welper calls "pilot films for the new, expanded series," will produce the new project, with Julian Ludwig as associate producer. Company also will set a name narrator and a technical advisor, latter to be a known and respected member of the film industry.

Meetings are now in progress with the Hollywood Museum Associates and the Museum of Modern Art in New York for use of materials controlled by these organizations.

play by Giles Cooper, the first editor of the BBC's "Maigret" skein and the man who adapted "The Lady of the Camellias" for Zeffirelli production in New York.

Following them into the studios Canadian Ted Kotcheff is directing a new play by Clive Exton who is currently working on the Metro feature remake of "Night Must Fall." This team is of talent nurtured and cultured by Sydney Newman when he was head of drama at ABC-TV.

The other teams are equally talented David Greene onetime head of CBC drama, directing a play by Willis Hall and Keith Waterhouse; ex-BBC and Old Vic man Michael Elliott directing a piece by Nigel Kneale who scripted the outstanding scifi skein on BBC-TV, "The Quatermass Experiment"; and Silvio Narizzano the Canadian who left Granada only last February after completing the mammoth "War and Peace" production which was recently raved over by the critics.

Overall exec producer for the six will be Stuart Burge who will make the sixth team himself, directing a play by Ken Taylor who is perhaps the most recently recognized writing talent in the bunch.

Says editor Richman: "All these men know each other and each other's work and most of them are personal friends who have never worked together. We thought it was a waste because in the field of creative tv drama people who know each other as well have a sympathy for each other's ideas and can work well if matched correctly. These men are at the top of their profession.

"The money they are paid for their work, while important to them, is now secondary to the chance they might get to be able to work undeterred by time or limitation. This is what we are doing for them: giving them freedom from the shortage of time."

These productions will go out fortnightly taking the place of ATV's "Drama 63" slots and alternating with ABC-TV's Sunday night "Armchair Theatre" slot.

is determined to build itself a reputable sports image.

The professional championship game will be played this year in the stadium of the western division winner. That market will be blacked out, which will mean a loss of advertising potential to any sponsors, yet pro football has so grown in popularity since '58 immense daytime audiences have gathered to watch.

At the outside, the best NBC-TV hopes to gross on the two-and-a-half hour program is $1,120,000-$1,140,000. Unless the web decides to raise its prices per minute, the best NBC can expect is a loss of a couple of hundred grand. The affiliates must still be paid for time and that cuts roughly 30% out of the gross. Production costs must be met, and that too means some $250,000—or, depending on how elaborately NBC chooses to do it—as much as $500,000.

NBC-TV owned championship rights in '61 and '62. That was a two-year deal at $615,000 per annum. Pete Rozelle, head of the National Football League, only permitted a one-year deal on the next championship game. Bidding on this one game and on the full season's tv rights for NFL games will probably center together next year. (CBS still has next season to go on a two-year full season deal.)

Sports Time," with Phil Rizzuto and "World Wide Sports," with Chris Schenkel; Robert Trout's seven Sunday news broadcasts; Allan Jackson's five on Saturday; Jack Drees' 10 weekend sports reports.

Among the reasons credited for the upsurge in biz, a development which is viewed as the turning point to black ink for CBS Radio, are the expansion of the news on the hour from five to 10 minutes, inaugurated November, '60; and the click of "Dimension." Latter format started in '60 with 43 broadcasts and has now swelled to 63 a week.

Recent additions to "Dimension" series, all of which have won sponsor nods, are Walter Cronkite; Hollywood fashion expert Edith Head, Abigail Van Buren's "Dear Abby," and "Personal Close-up," with Mike Wallace.

Roster of sponsors which came to the web in '62, not accounted for the previous year, includes: American Express Co., Campbell Soup, Studebaker Packard, Chrysler, General Electric, General Mills, General Motors, Kellogg, Minnesota Mining, and Texaco.

could be a block to rapid comeback of the big money shows, says Hammer, is the lack of competent producers around. There just aren't any available, he says. The five or six who haven't drifted into other types of production are the ones still banned because of the scandals.

But Hammer is optimistic enough to have a couple of quiz ideas working—one is a game show for kids, another a music quiz format that could have the big prizes; and another, which he considers the best, is an association bit based on symbols created by contestants and called "Fiddle Sticks."

Just in case, however, he's working out details now on a Jonathon Winters-Fernandel special to be shot in Paris with the two comedians in a version of "American in Paris," and a legit musical slated for October opening on Broadway, "Sugar City," a rewrite of the "Blue Angel" with a New Orleans setting.

OTELLO
With Richard Cassilly, Ilona Kombrink, Louis Quilico, John McCollum, Nasco Petroff, Jan Rubes, Victor Braun, Elsie Sawchuk, William Copeland
Producer-Director: Franz Kraemer
135 Mins., Mon., Mon., 8:30 p.m.
TRANS-CANADA TELEPHONES
CBC-TV, from Toronto (tape)
(McKeon)

With Richard Cassilly in the title-role, Ilona Kombrink as Desdemona and Louis Quilico as Iago, a two and one-quarter hour performance of Verdi's Othello" was presented in English on CBC-TV. The English-language version of the Verdi work was by Eric Cloaser and based on Arrigo Boito's libretto, from Shakespeare's play.

Franz Kraemer was producer and director, Ernesto Barbini conducted the 89-piece orch and the 54-voice chorus. "Othello" was taped in three days in Toronto after four weeks of rehearsal. Its' massive and sweeping sets were by Trevor Williams and the costly production was sponsored by the Trans-Canada Telephone System, the English-language opera going to all network tv stations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. French web of the CBC got it the following Saturday.

Although the principal trio and the supporting cast were in splendid voice and diction, one wonders at the captive audience in Canada's provinces who, for 135 mins., were unable to switch to anything else but grand opera and get an American outlet.

Act 1, videtaped separately and occupying the entire space of CBC's studio seven, set the pace with Othello's victorious return to his palace as commander of the Venetian fleet. The entire cast, including extras, were worked into the opening act, while the remaining three acts, set inside the palace and courtyard, were videotaped in sequence the following three days. One of the trickiest problems was that the cast and the 89-piece orch was a mile apart in different buildings.

The Verdi opera, based on Shakespeare's tragedy, is well-known and tells the dramatic story of the powerful Moor and his passionate love for Desdemona and the engineering of its destruction by the wily and evil Iago.

Cassilly, a 6'3" Othello with strapping build had never before sung the role. St. Louis-born Miss Kombrink had sung Desdemona, as had Montreal-born Quilico. All are excellent actors as well as singers and brought consistency to both departments. They were immeasurably aided in supporting roles by John McCollum, Nasco Petroff, Jan Rubes, Victor Braun, Elsie Sawchuk and William Copeland. (The chorus was inadequate).

Operatic highlights included the Othello and Desdemona duet in Act I, the duet of Othello and Iago, the Iago "Credo" Aria in Act III, the sextet in Act III, and Desdemona's "Willow Song" and "Ave Maria" in Act IV.

Kraemer's Franz staying wisely lacked any pretension, while adhering to the dramatic story-line of the tragedy, plus the mass-level of crowd scenes. The Williams sets were opulent as were Suzanne Mess's costume designs. Camera work was adept. McStay.

BIRTHDAY HOUSE
With Paul Tripp, Kay Eberdt, others
Producer: Lester Lewis Associates
Director: John Dorsey
30 Mins., Mon.-Fri., 9 a.m.
PARTICIPATING
WNBC-TV, N.Y.

Paul Tripp, long identified with children's shows, is back in his original metier with "Birthday House" which comes in at a time when the pre-school children start wondering how to heckle the household. Tripp, as has long been evident, has a knack with the moppets. In this show, he has devised little tricks for them, and effectively takes the kids into a different world and out of mama's hair.

The format is fairly simple. Tripp invites a kid to the studio to mark the birthday along with a few friends of the celebrant. He leads them through games, songs, and a few educational items. On the show caught, he demonstrated the flute member of the woodwind family. However, he was wise in directing most of the show to the home audience. He created some musical doodles with orchestral background, which were for the juveniles. Much of the video entertainment devised for children, is also suitable for adults.

CHICAGO'S CHANGING FACES
With Charles McCann, narrator; Lloyd Wendt, Larry Fanning, Emmett Redmon, Don Maxwell, others
Exec Producer: Frank Jordan
Producer-Writer: Bob Limit
Director: Tony Verdi
60 Mins., Thurs., 9 p.m.
HOME FEDERAL SAVINGS
WNBQ, Chicago (film, tape)
(Adv. Division)

WNBQ gave over an hour of prime time last week to butter up the four Chicago dailies with a documentary on their new or emerging personalities as contrasted with the flamboyance of the Chi press in the "Front Page" era of the '20's. It was a program that took no risks, either in content or in documentary technique, and came off as a flavorless puff job with not much believability. To viewers with no particular interest in the newspaper game it must have been a long years, assuming they lasted it out.

The subject had great possibilities, but the treatment was shallow and the execution ordinary. Biggest problem that scripter Bob Limit seems to have faced was how to say an equal number of nice things about all four gazettes, or more accurately the proper number in proportion to the circulation of each. Limit never left the impression, as indicated by the weak conclusion voiced by Charles McCann that "Chicago's newspapers may not be the best in the nation, but they're not the worst either."

Much statistical info and historical background was dispensed, but facts alone don't make a documentary. Director Tony Verdi's use of still photos was surprisingly static in a day when tv has learned to make dramatic use of them, and his brief camera studies of heads during interviews were futile, failing to reveal the aspects of character he'd apparently hoped them to. Scenes of the city rooms and opportions on the beat were lackluster and self-conscious, and stock footage of the Tribune's paper mill in Canada irrelevant.

Main point made was that newspapers had grown conservative and that they've changed because of changes that have taken place in our society. For what it had to say, it could have done as well in a 30 minute format. As a production Thursday night special preempting the "Andy Williams Show" and promising, at the outset, to evaluate the papers it was a tedious disappointment. Lee.

FIRST CONCERT
With Robert Shaw, Cleveland Symphony Orch.
Producer-Director: Don Rumbaugh
60 Mins.; Fri. 7 p.m.
Distributor: Westinghouse Broadcasting
WOR-TV, N. Y. (tape)

A fetching combination of music and musical lore for youngsters of all ages was delivered by "First Concert," second in a series of Westinghouse Broadcasting produced specials. The hourlong outing was telecast by RKO General station WOR-TV, in N. Y., in prime evening time.

Robert Shaw, for this special, did not have his world renowned choral with him, however, he did have the Cleveland Symphony Orch., and they combined their talents for a concert aimed at captivating the attention of young children, and widening their musical horizons.

Music ranged from Bach's "Suite Number Three in B Major" to Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker Suite." Producer-director Don Rumbaugh, of KYW-TV, the WBC station in Cleveland, for the most part did not fiddle with the cameras. The shots generally were straight and to the musical point. Occasionally a montage was called into play for variety.

Shaw, at the half-way mark, took the children by the hand and explained the difference between music and noise. The explanation was punctuated by humor and the participation of the audience. He also had a short intro to each of the pieces played. Hora.

THE HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT
With Robert Trout
Producer: Gordon Hyatt
Director: John Monitti
Writer: Hyatt
30 Mins., Wed., 8 p.m.
CROCK FULL O'NUTS
WCBS-TV, New York
(Peerless)

New York's housing hangup has had several radio and tv documentary treatments, but few if any in the bright and still effectively critical style of "The House That Jack Built," a looksee at the suburban blight surrounding Manhattan.

While WCBS-TV cameras swept the esthetically arid wastelands of Levittown and other builder's paradises, Robert Trout, via producer Gordon Hyatt's script, gave a perceptive appraisal of the situation from public need to realtor greed; not, of course, without a few fine examples of how it can be done with economy and taste.

Among other things, the commentary tore into the lumpish design that overwhelms the scene and the stretches of bulldozed land where the natural beauty of trees etc. might have been used to enhance the homes—homes that stand "like warts on a toad."

In a 5,000-mile tour of research and filming, almost all of it within a 60-mile radius of New York City, a touch of nostalgia and comparison was added with views of home styles dating back to the 1700s. Conclusion, things aint what they used to be, when homes had "quality" items such as attics and in one period were even comodious enough to have an upstairs room for a crazy uncle. But, concluded the show, the modern mud huts of suburbia—designed in the northeast part of the country, at least, 80% by builders and only 2% by architects—are "happily perishable," and taste and imagination may again prevail in a blending with terrain and America tradition.

Trout showed considerable comedic talent in on-camera opening and closing bits, appearing first as a bewildered home owner peering out of the foyer into the split-level recreation room where teenagers were twisting to an atonal r&r dink; and behind the closing credit crawl as a smoke-maligned amateur chef charcoaling a steak on what must have been as idiotically designed a back porch as could be found in a 5,000 mile search. Bill.

PROJECT DROPOUT
With Dave Moore, others
Producer-Writer: Jim Dooley
Director: Clarence Anderson
30 Mins.: Wed., 7 p.m.
WCCO-TV, Minneapolis (tape)

Following in the footsteps of many of its meritorious predecessors, this CBS affiliated WCCO-TV documentary dealt with a current nation-wide problem and did it in the customary topdrawer fashion.

"Project Dropout" delved into the social effects and consequences resulting from less able youngsters' departures from high school before graduation and their predominantly unsuccessful efforts to embark on adult careers prematurely, mainly because of lack of skills and necessary qualifications. Possible remedies also were touched upon.

Among other things, the documentary brought out that these youths comprise the bulk of the nation's unemployed, they figure prominently in juvenile delinquency, the sad plight of so many in their ranks is of great concern to social workers and the citizenry generally, and the matter now is the subject of much study leading to many steps in the effort to improve a deplorable situation.

More than it's predecessors, this documentary had the very proficient staff narrator Dave Moore talking nearly all of the 30 minutes, the only interruptions to his verbal description being brief interviews with several authorities in the matter and the voicing of their difficulties by some of the young people themselves.

But what Moore had to say, written by WCCO's Jim Dooley, was exceedingly interesting and informative in bringing to light what's of much concern to society. Also, the wordage was backgrounded by enlivening film action which gave the program visual and entertainment content. This in itself reflected credit on producer Dooley, director Clarence Anderson and cameraman Bob Sjoholm. Rees.

THE WAR THAT CREEPS
With Dane Clark, narrator
Producers: M. Fujita, Walter D. Engels, William A. Cooper
Writer: Christine Stewart
60 Mins.; Fri., 8:30 p.m.
WPIX, N.Y.

"The War That Creeps" was an interesting report on the war in Vietnam which became particularly timely last week in light of the outbreak of new conflict in the Laotian corner of Southeast Asia. This documentary about Vietnam successfully conveyed the idea that the struggle against the Communist forces in this area of the world will be a long, difficult and expensive commitment for the American government.

"The War That Creeps" devoted most of its attention to the military struggle between south and north Vietnam. In focus were the efforts of the south Vietnamese forces, trained and equipped by U. S. military, to push back the Communist guerillas infiltrating from the north. Some military maneuvers were shown in detail, including an encounter with some guerillas recently killed and arduous campaigns through the jungles and swamplands of Vietnam.

The accent on the military aspect left time for only perfunctory consideration of the political factors involved in the conflict. In this respect, the documentary failed to emphasize the crucial fact that the U. S. Government is urging the south Vietnam regime to introduce thoroughgoing reforms or face ultimate defeat. The necessity for such reforms were given a once-lightly-over treatment in a script that could not decide whether to deliver a straight report about the reasons for the success of the Communist guerillas or to indulge in superficial propaganda blasts against a fanatical and mysterious enemy.

The documentary was best when it showed some of the life of the Vietnamese people in Saigon, in the primitive backwoods and in the new stockade-type of communities set up by the south to restrict movements of the guerillas. Throughout, however, the camera work was characterized by a reluctance to get close to the people. And though the script referred to the soldiers' fear of death, an idea that is now trilely repeated in all war documentaries, there was no emotional documentation of this fear in any facial expressions.

EYE ON NEW YORK
With Mike Wallace
Producer: Ray Abel
Director: Abel
Writer: Ray Gandolf
30 Mins., Sat., 1:30 p.m.
CROCK FULL O'NUTS
WCBS-TV, N. Y.

Mike Wallace has taken over WCBS-TV's "Eye on New York" as his first tv assignment with the CBS flagship, initialing his new affiliation with a half hour on that puhaffairs fetish, juve delinquency.

This entry in the crowded wayward-youth field provided some interest by focusing on a progressive treatment centre for teen girls, Turrell Residential Group Center in New Jersey. There were talks with officials of the Center and the usual exposition, including interviews with inmates, but prime interest came from two therapy sessions, during which the girls work on each others problems.

With no loss in dramatic effect (or maybe it helped) the girls were filmed in silhouette and voices were slightly distorted in sound to hide identities.

All in all, it seemed a rather routine view of advanced institutional administration. Show's one revelation to the balance of viewers might have been the femme director's disclosure that delinquency as a status symbol is a problem. She told of the girl who came from a social environment that would consider Turrell "square," with a stay at a regular reformatory much more desirable for group acceptance.

With Wallace at the helm, the show's title will change this Saturday to "Eye on . . ." with the topic of the stanza inserted as part of the title. WCBS-TV exec Norman Walt Jr figures it will have more immediacy to viewers under the new title. Bill.

TONY AWARDS
With Abe Burrows, Robert Morse, others
Producer: Dave Yarnell
Director: Bob Eberle
Writer: Michael Lawrence
70 Mins., Sun. 10 p.m.
WOR-TV, N. Y.

The packing by television of award presentations to members of the entertainment industry has a built-in appeal. The sessions naturally involve celebrities and that in itself constitutes a strong lure. Furthermore, there's news value in being in on the initial disclosure of the winners whether they be recipients of an Oscar, Emmy or, as was the case last Sunday night (28), a Tony.

The Tony awards, presented by the American Theatre Wing in honor of its founder, the late Antoinette Perry, are given for "distinguished contributions to the theatre." Last Sunday marked the 17th annual presentation of the medallions with the event telecast by WOR-TV from the Imperial Ballroom of the Americana Hotel, N. Y. The ceremony was carried by WOR-TV as a Public Affairs presentation. WCBS-TV, which had showcased the award presentations the last five years, mixed an offer to go with it again this year because no agreement could be reached on sponsorship of the show.

Besides providing an on-the-spot report of the winners and a looksee at performers, producers, directors, writers, etc., the WOR telecast had little to commend it. It was a routine outing for an awards presentation. Scripter-stager Abe Burrows and actor Robert Morse shared the emcee chores. Both have been funnier. An introduction to the proceedings was provided by actor Sam Levene, who got in an occasional laugh line. Jean Shepherd did an okay job for the station in supplying background info on the winners while they made their way from tables on the ballroom floor to the stage.

Burrows was thrown off balance when he was unexpectedly interrupted while speaking by a man, identified as Ronnie Mills, who ran up to the platform to complain that he could not make a living because newspapers wouldn't accept his advertisements. The incident, which left Burrows somewhat unnerved, also placed the technicians in a quandary. They shifted their cameras to the audience, but failed to block out the sound completely while Mills was evidently being ushered off the stage.

The matter was never clearly explained leaving viewers in a somewhat confused state. Mills had pulled a similar stunt the previous Tuesday on NBC-TV's "Tonight" show. It's understood that Johnny Carson, that program's host, was visibly shaken by the appearance of Mills who's trying to promote a dating service which he operates.

Participating in the awards ceremony besides Levene, Burrows, Morse and the prize recipients were a flock of name performers who served as presentors. They included Helen Menken, Celeste Holm, Van Heflin, Rosalind Russell, Pat Hingle, Phyllis Newman, Charles Nelson Reilly, Anita Gillette, Dane Clark, Orson Bean, Diahann Carroll, Walter Matthau, Elizabeth Ashley, Jean Pierre Aumont, Martin Gabel, Vivian Blaine, Maureen O'Sullivan, William Prince, Betty Field, Nancy Kelly, Helen Hayes, June Havoc and David Wayne.

Miss Hayes presented a special award to Irving Berlin for his long-time contribution to the musical theatre and Miss Havoc dispensed a special citation to the "Beyond the Fringe" company, consisting of Britishers Alan Bennett, Peter Cook, Jonathan Miller and Dudley Moore. Berlin was unable to attend the Tony affair but his award was accepted by Russel Crouse, collibrettist of the current Broadway production of "Mr President" for which Berlin wrote the score. Another special award was presented by producer Roger L. Stevens to W. McNeil Lawry, in behalf of the Ford Foundation, for "distinguished support of American theatre."

A notable aspect of the evening was the tremendous ovation given vet singer George Abbott, the winner in past several years of four Tony awards, when he copped his fifth citation for his staging of "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum." A complete list of the Tony winners is included in a story elsewhere in this issue. Jose.

Canada Session On Feevee Vs. Freevee

Ottawa, April 30.

Radio and television coverage of the June 4 session of the Board of Broadcast Governors has been okayed by BBG Session, in Ottawa, will mark "additional forum the development of mixed television systems and broadcast financing and broadcasting policy." Broadcasters have been invited to present their comments, and BBG will listen to representations of cable tv systems.

Board's big worry is what cable tv might do to the policy, established by law in Canada, that broadcasting stations achieve certain national purposes. This is a condition of license, and BBG figures the cable people cannot undermine up to this regulation. The board is also concerned with the economic effect on broadcasting stations.

IVY AVERBACK'S NEW FOUR STAR TICKET

Hollywood, April 30.

Ivy Averback, who produced-directed "Ensign O'Toole," has signed a new exclusive producer-director contract with Four Star Television.

Major portion of Averback's time for the coming season will be devoted to the creation and development of new properties.

Creator and packager of tv shows originally joined Four Star four years ago.

Stanley Kallis has signed a new contract as producer and associate producer at Four Star. He will be producer of some pilots and serve as an associate on company series.

7 More Countries Join CBS O&O Exchange

Eight broadcasters from Europe, North and South America and the Far East will join the CBS-TV o&o's in their third annual international program exchange.

Radiodiffusion (France), Norddeutscher Rundfunk (West Germany) and Swiss Television Service (Switzerland) are joining the exchange for the first time. The other broadcasters, from Italy, Canada, Mexico, Japan and Ireland, have participated in earlier exchanges.

Programs contributed to the exchange from abroad include an Italian concert, a French program of ballet, a chamber of music recital performed by West German artists and variety programs from Mexico, Japan and Ireland. CBS' contribution will be "American Jam," produced by WBBM, Chicago.

Zenith Tint Sales Doubled In Year

Chicago, April 30.

In reporting still another quarterly record in sales and earnings to stockholders last week, Zenith Radio Corp. announced that color tv sales to dealers the first three months of this year were approximately double that of the first quarter of 1962. Black and white unit sales were reported the highest of any quarter in Zenith history.

Company hit an alltime first quarter high this year with profits of $5,062,000 after taxes, or 56c per share, on sales of $92,264,084. Sales were up 13% over last year's first quarter record and profits 7% over the same period.

SG's 'Threshold' Series

Hollywood, April 30.

Screen Gems exec producer Harry Ackerman and writer James Warner Bellah are developing a new hourlong telepix project, "The Threshold," for the 1964-65 season.

WAGNER TO HOPE SERIES

Hollywood, April 30.

Ray Wagner has been named assistant to Alan J. Miller, exec producer on the NBC-TV "The Bob Hope Show" at Revue studios. Miller, production chief at Revue, is currently lining up personnel and properties for the series which goes into production this summer.

Variety-ARB's weekly chart offers a day-by-day analysis of the top feature running shots in a particular market. On Saturdays and Sundays, daytime feature shots compete with nighttime pix periods for designation as the top feature shot of the day. The analysis is confined to the top rated feature shots in the ARB measured period, broken down by days in the week. The ARB measured period usually covers three or four weeks. Other data such as the time slot and total area homes is furnished. Top competition and competitive ratings also are highlighted.

Montreux TV Fest Now on 'Must' List

The tv program festival in Montreux, Switzerland, currently underway, is emerging as the most important international tv program fete. This is the opinion of many American foreign execs, who keep tabs on such tv festivals as the one in Cannes and Monaco.

The Montreux fete, which will end Friday (3), has attracted entries from the three American networks in its program competition. ABC has "Jazz Scene, USA"; CBS, "Julie and Carol at Carnegie Hall"; and NBC, "The Dinah Shore Show." It also has attracted entries from Britain, Japan, Bulgaria and many other European countries. It is endorsed by the European Broadcasting Union.

The fete in Montreux, as is currently run, offers little if any opportunity for wheeling and dealing on the sale of programs. It is on the must list, though, of many execs dealing in the international market, as a place to visit and be seen.

CBS-TV 'ADVENTURE' GETS BISCUIT COIN

National Biscuit became the first sponsor to climb aboard CBS-TV's "Great Adventure," the hourlong series which will deal with facets of American history.

National Biscuit bought one third alternate week sponsorship for the first three months of the series, upping the company's slice to a weekly third after the first of the year. Show, being produced by John Houseman, will be telecast Fridays at 7:30 p.m.

Web, prior to the National Biscuit sale, veered between securing a single bluechip bankroller and opening the vehicle to participating sponsors. Lateness in securing sponsor support was attributable to lack of pilot and earlier, the lack of story lines for each episode. Latter delaying factor now has been corrected.

Flock of Participations On CBS Current Sked

New biz on CBS-TV for the current session includes a roster of participations on the nighttime schedule, in addition to some daytime orders.

Florida Development Commission bought Saturday quarter-hour in "Captain Kangaroo." Carter Products inked for participations in "Alfred Hitchcock," "Reckoning," "Twilight Zone," "Nurses," "Eyewitness," and "Fair Exchange."

Lever Bros. bought a participation in the "Keefe Brasselle Show," "Reckoning," "Fair Exchange" and the new pubaffairs summer series which will be substituted for the axed "Eyewitness."

Plough Inc. bought participations in "Hitchcock" and "Twilight Zone." General Motors Frigidaire Division in a summer deal, bought into "Brasselle Show," "Reckoning," "Hitchcock," "Twilight Zone," "Mr. Ed" and "Fair Exchange."

Grampian the Champion

London, April 30.

According to figures just released by TAM here, the Grampian TV regional station racked up 50 of its own home produced shows in the local Top Ten charts through the winter season ending March 31. This was a record outside of the four majors serving the three largest commercial tv areas London, Midlands and Northern.

Ulster TV had the next highest rating having clocked 38 of its own programs into the Top Ten during that season.

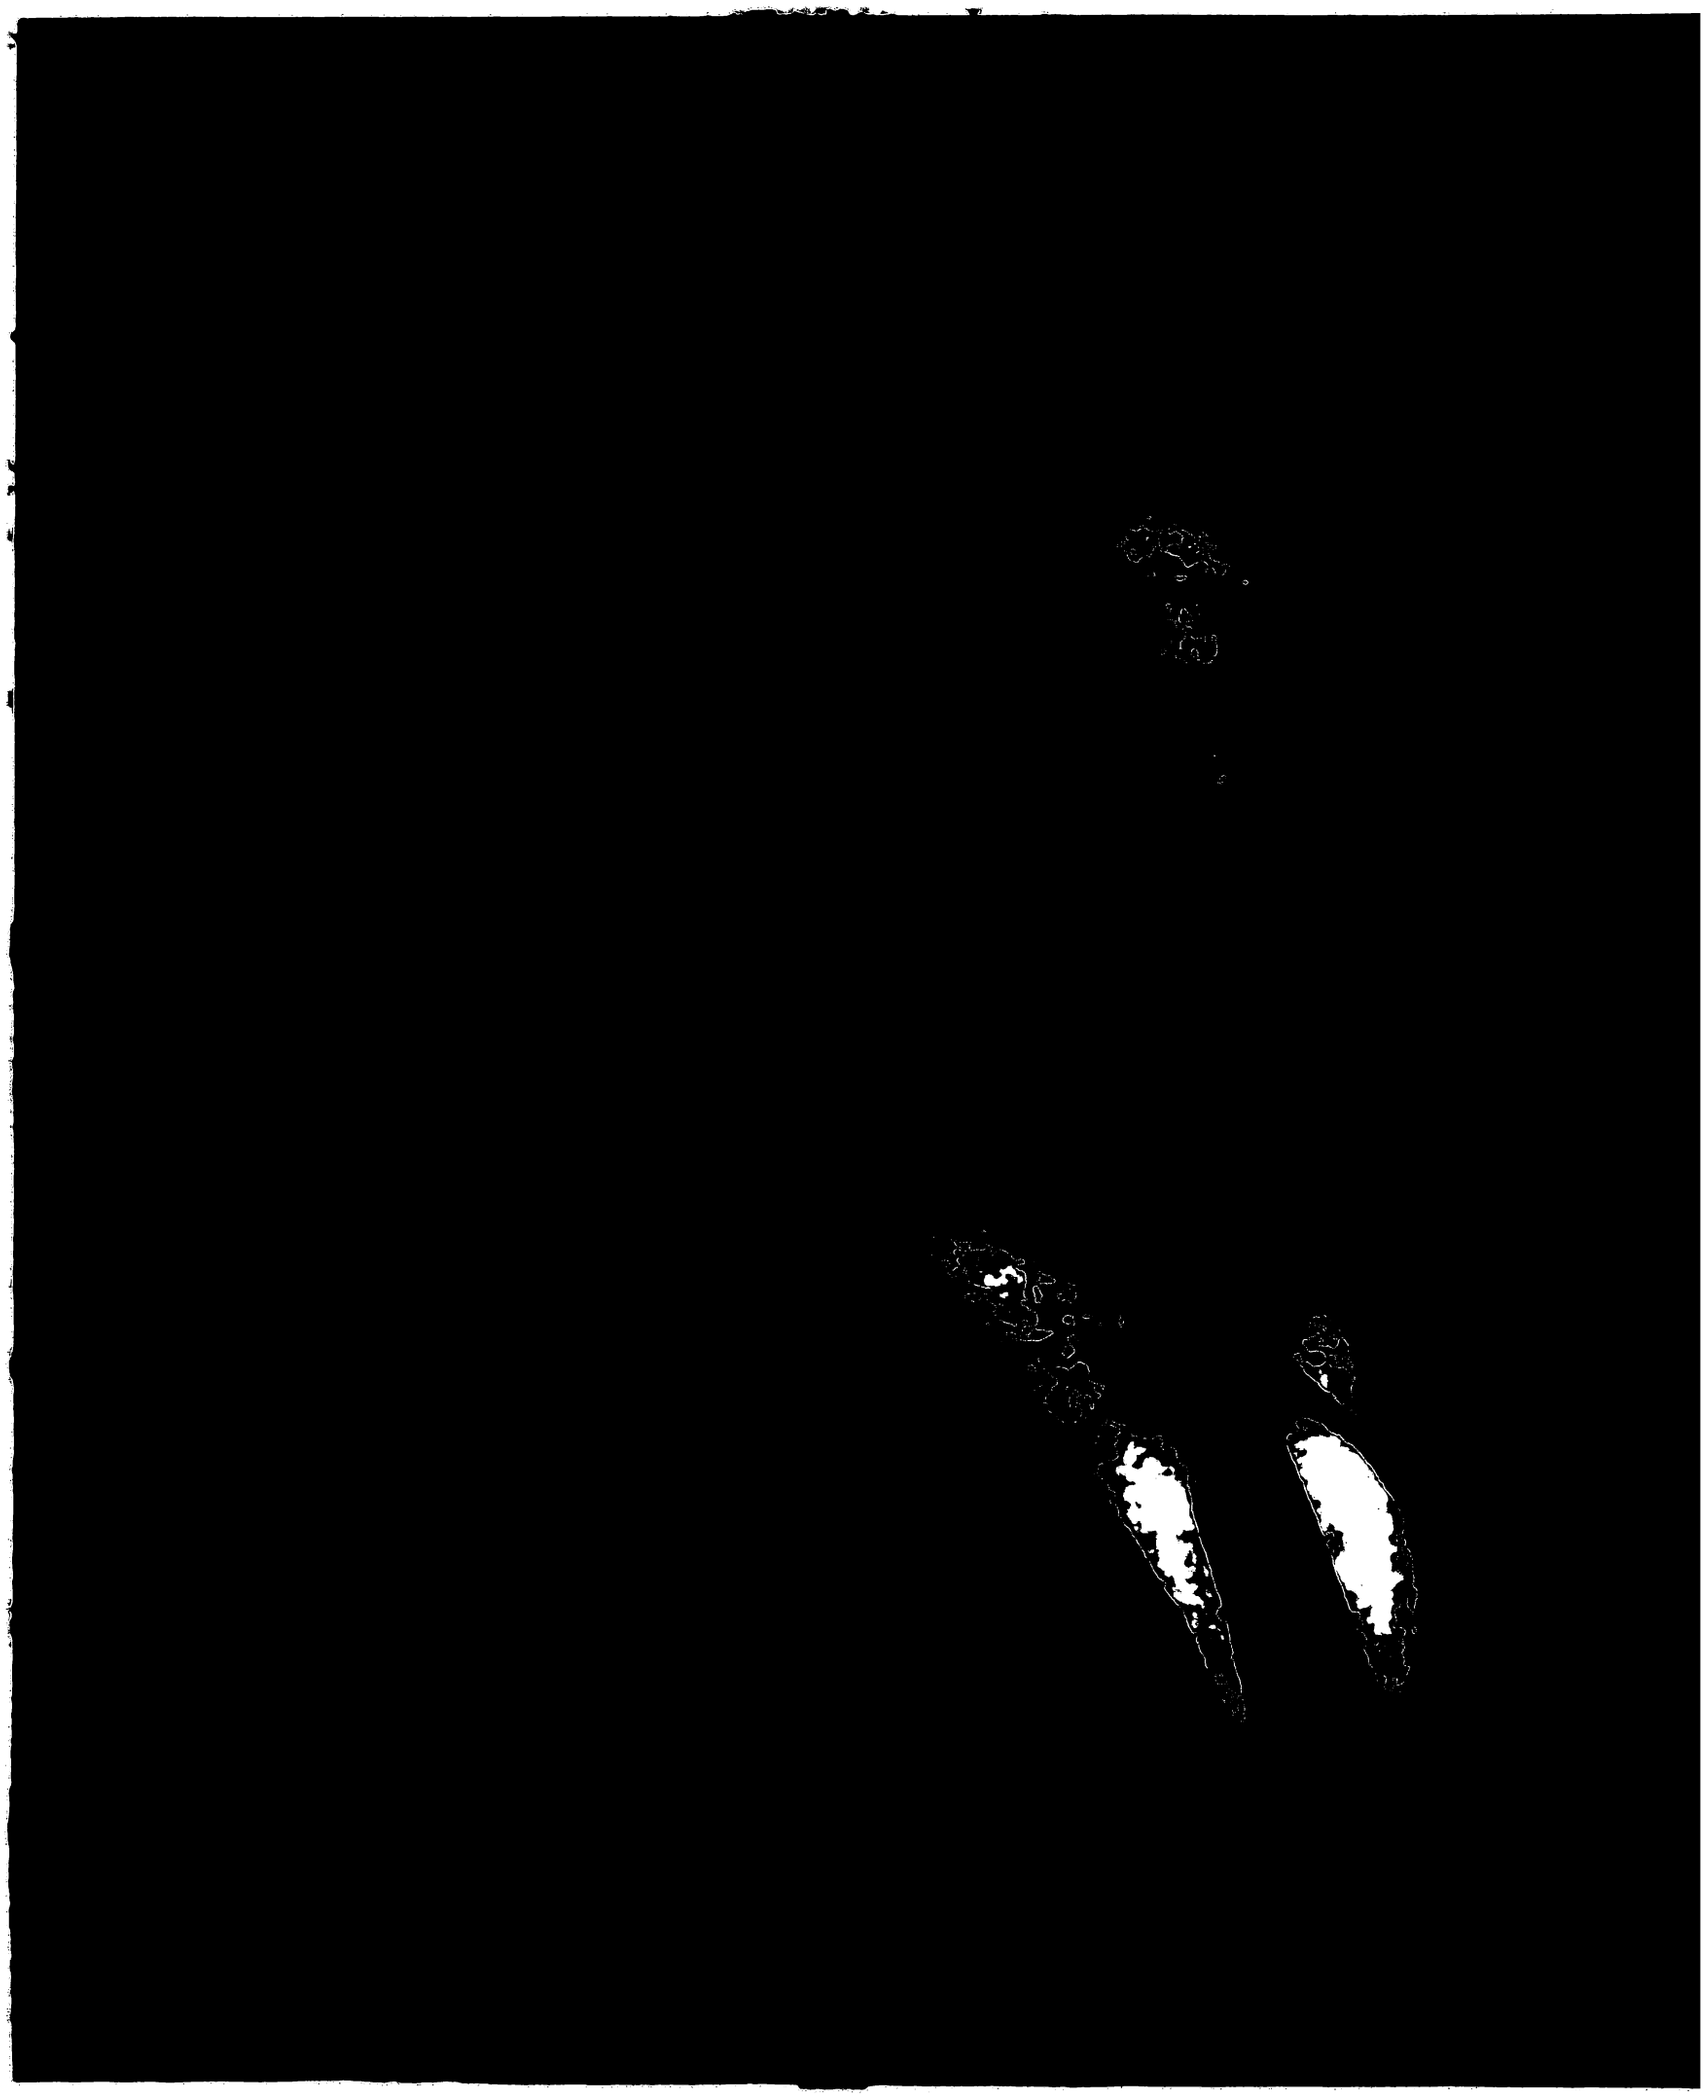
MAXIMUM BOYS PICK POWERS

Washington, April 30.

Assn. of Maximum Telecasters appointed Gordon Powers Jr. as assistant exec director.

He formerly was in the information service department of the Porcelain Enamel Institute in Washington.

San Antonio: Mark Sommers, formerly program director of KTSA here, has been transferred to WYNR Corp.'s Beth and Gordon McLendon controlled outlets. Sommers will assume operations director at WYNR.



Good-Cheer Leader

You might call Mitch Miller "the man with the happy arms." But it's also true that the same viewers who are so familiar with song-leader Mitch's "cheerful" arms and hands never quite know what's up his sleeve.

It's this element of surprise—along, of course, with the show's solid musical and visual values—that will make "Sing Along with Mitch" so worthy an ingredient in NBC-TV's Fall line-up.

During the current season, the program's most talked-about "little-innovation" has been its practice of planting a celebrity among its 25 male choristers in the concluding, lyrics-on-screen segment of each show.

The celebrity is not identified (nor is the "bit" even referred to on the air). Viewers who "think" they've spotted such unlikely choristers as Sir Cedric Hardwicke, Walter Slezak or Milton Berle simply have to go on wondering.

Next season's "Sing Along with Mitch" audiences can look forward to additional surprises—which we have no intention of tipping here. But among the new "regular" features will be the appearances of guest choral groups from all over the nation and solo performances by young, outstanding musicians (professional) making their television debuts.

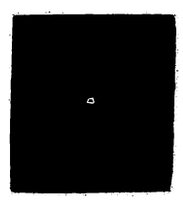
Back again, naturally, will be Mitch himself; the Sing Along Gang; soloists like Leslie Uggams, Bob McGrath and Victor Griffin; the 10 lovely girl dancers; and the rest of the beguiling company that's made this weekly color series a national favorite for two seasons.

Come Autumn, "Sing Along with Mitch" (which is moving to Monday nights) will be the singingest part of a varied NBC-TV roster that includes the front-rank drama of "The Richard Boone Show"; the news treatments of the expanded "Huntley-Brinkley Report"; and the buoyant comedy of Imogene Coca's "Grindl." We don't believe there's ever been a more attractive schedule.



Look to NBC for the best combination of news, information and entertainment.

VARIETY - ARB SYNDICATION CHART

VARIETY's weekly tabulation based on ratings furnished by American Research Bureau, highlights the top 10 network shows on a local level and offers a rating study of the top 10 syndicated shows in the same particular markets. This week six different markets are covered.

Both the network and syndication study features the total area homes reached and the metro area ratings on each show. The total area homes reached reflects the audiences on the basis of the total market area examined. The metro area ratings are based on the metropolitan markets within the total area examined. Top 10 shows, both network and syndicated, are listed on the basis of their showing in the total area homes barometer.

Various branches of the industry, ranging from media buyers to local stations to syndicators will find the charts valuable.

Over the course of a year, ARB will tabulate a minimum of 207 markets. The results of that tabulation will be found weekly in VARIETY. Coupled with the rating performance of the top 10 network shows, on the local level, the VARIETY-ARB charts are designed to reflect the rating tastes of virtually every market in the U.S.

"Dear Arthur Godfrey, Please don't ever sell Cadillacs.

"I'd have to have one." That's how a lady in Texas began her letter to Godfrey. If you think she's putting it strongly, you should see the rest of his mail.

"My husband finally took his own shoes to be soled, after hearing you talk about Neolite." . . . "We try to buy all the products you advertise." . . . "My family have named our house The House of Godfrey." . . . "If you sell it, we have it." . . . "I've found out everything you say is true."

And Godfrey isn't the only one Godfrey listeners write to. Here's a sampling of letters the Kerr Glass people got: "Sirs, thank you for being one of Arthur Godfrey's sponsors." . . . "I always listen to Arthur Godfrey. And I always use Kerr jars." . . . "After listening to Arthur Godfrey talk about your Kerr lids, I'm convinced I should use no others."

When listeners respond like this, it's no wonder so many sponsors renew with Godfrey on the CBS Radio Network. No wonder Kerr Glass just renewed. And Chemway for Lady Esther cosmetics. And Warner-Lambert for Bromo-Seltzer and Listerine.

And you can see why Salada Tea just chose Godfrey to help introduce a new product, their Iced Tea Mix. What better way to get quick national acceptance? Who else can give you commercials that are accepted like advice from a trusted friend?

Make sense to you? Then wouldn't it also make sense for the product you're selling? Talk it over with your ad agency rep or CBS Radio account executive.

Godfrey will sell any good product he believes in. Even—with apologies to the lady from Texas—Cadillacs.

PEPPINO GIRELLA
With Eduardo De'Filippo, Giuliana Lojodice, Enzo Turco, Pietro Carloni, Carlo Lima, Giuseppe Pinto, Gennarino Palumbo, Vittorio Sanoini, Angelo Love, Pino Cuomo, Vittorio Mandrino, Mario Mangini, Sara Ferri, Elena Tilena, Umberto Guarnio, Mariuccia Cerasuo, Luisa Conte, Anna Valley, Ugo D'Alessio, Enzo Consolo, Nina de Padova, Nino Geneveso, Clara D'Elia, Raffaele Serrentino, Clara Bindi, Carlo Romano.
Writer-Director: Eduardo De'Filippo
Music: Romolo Grano
75 Mins., Sun., 9:15 p.m.
RAI-TV, from Rome (tape)

Eduardo De'Filippo's first video original, slated for six weekly installments, looks a definite winner both in quality and audience appeal on the basis of first two stanzas. Condensed, it should also be a natural for theatrical staging.

The elaborately developed and intricate tale of a Naples youth, Peppino Girella, his family and friends, is pretext for another of Eduardo's warmly human, sometimes bitter, but always true-ringing stories in which character development and the turn of a phrase are just as important as the plot line and its immediate effects on the spectator. Acting, down to smallest bit, was excellent and the parts sharply cast. Eduardo De'Filippo was once again impressive as Peppino's father, while Giuseppe Pinto as the boy, Giuliana Lojodice, Carlo Romano, Enzo Turco, Pietro Carloni, and many others in large and colorful cast scored to a like degree. Technical credits, including indoor as well as on-the-spot Naples street tapes, were impressive in an elaborate and rewarding production. Hawk.

BOY MEETS GIRL
With Daniel Farson
Director: Bobbie Gamble
45 Mins., Wed., 9:40 p.m.
Associated-Rediffusion, from London

Daniel Farson, who conducted these variations on a theme of courtship, has a fine flair for extracting uninhibited talk from his interviewees, and this resulted in intriguing comment from dating youngsters on their social habits. However, this was not enough to give the program a backbone. Farson was too self-effacing and glib to raise it from a causerie to a document.

A reminiscence of the punctilio and decorum associated with pre-1914 courtship was pleasantly delivered by the Dowager Lady Abercromby, but this was contrasted with the getting-together of modern young people outside the aristocratic belt. The comparison did not come off, because it was invalid. Far better to have matched two generations of the same background.

When the topic of trial marriage came up, the level of seriousness dropped in an unconsciously comic-dueling between romantic novelists Denise Robbins and Barbara Cartland. They seemed to support premarital experiment, but then destroyed their apparent spirituality with cautionary injunctions. A thodox sensibly supported some part of knowledge of this kind, and the anonymous young couple were very much against it, opining that it took the meaning out of the eventual ceremony.

Bobbie Gamble directed crisply, and the show didn't lose interest. But its indecision about whether to amuse or probe resulted in a superficial survey, the most memorable, but irrelevant, moments of which were an evocation by poet Laurie Lee of the magic of rural courtship. Otta.

THIS NATION TOMORROW
With Kenneth Allsop
Producer: Derek Bulcroyde
45 Mins., Sun., 10:15 p.m.
BBC-TV, from London

Recruiting top men on Government and industry provided the initial theme for this new fortnightly skein, intended to explore the state of Britain and those new ideas which might give it a shot in the arm. Format is to allow a specialist, in this case, economist Michael Shanks, author of "The Stagnant Society"—to state his point of view, which is then discussed by an expert panel of three. The talk is supervised by Kenneth Allsop, from the "Tonight" team, who kept a fair grip of the reins in this opener.

Shanks, with facts to support him, averred that Government departments and boards of directors were sadly lacking in the right technological expertise at the top. He inveighed against the cult of amateurism in administration, and instanced the French example, where technocrats had positions of power and were, he opined, responsible for the remarkable postwar boost to the Gallic economy.

These views, clearly and forthrightly delivered, were probed by Socialist economist Thomas Balogh, Antony Flew, a varsity philosopher, and the boss of Vickers, Leslie Rowan, who had also been a high-up in the British Civil Service. They tended to disagree in minor detail—about the capacity of administrators, for example, Rowan claiming that top management is more concerned with people than the industrial processes. Flew complained that the British system of higher education formed a needless gap between the arts and the sciences, and Balogh contested Shanks's claim that a guy like Dr. Beeching, brought from private industry to streamline the state railways, was a prophet of the new age.

The discussion was inclined to wander and stray up cul-de-sacs, and it lost immediacy because it was pre-filmed. The essence of these affairs, which is spontaneity and intellectual surprise, was lost. In other respects, the show made an interesting and worthwhile start. Otta.

LA FIERA DEI SOGNI
(Dream Fairground)
With Mike Bongiorno, Paola Penni, Tony de Vita Grob., guests
Director: Gianni Serra
60 Mins.; Sat. 9:15 p.m.
RAI-TV, from Milan (tape)

Mike Bongiorno's new quizzer has a good potential for local ratings if certain initial bugs can be licked. Opening show was slow paced and devoted to long-winded explanation of mechanics of the game, etc. These should disappear once the pattern becomes more familiar.

What is already clear however is that the stanza does not intend to accent the mechanics, but the human side of its contestants, who are there not to win money for themselves, but to reap success and support for a cause or needy person. For example, initial show had a Milan journalist vying for coin with which to send a boy to visit his relatives in South America, and tenor Giuseppe Di Stefano competing against the clock to see a promising singer through voice school.

On the first show caught, the human element projected strongly and to good effect, but the case of queries lifted any suspense there might have been. Also, since the entire show is taped, it lacks the immediateness and sudden-death elements of the traditional quiz show. Result is a carefully doused and composed show which lacks that vital unexpectedness that is the most element of such items. Suspense and credibility of same sort must be imported if "Fiera" is to become a high rater.

RENDEZVOUS
With Line Renaud, Renato Carosone, Paolo Poli, George Brown Ballet, Giovanni Ricordi, Matilde & Paul Dauprat, Alvaro Alvisi, Aldo Buzzavarre Orch.
Director: Vito Molinari
Writers: Leo Chiosso, Molinari
70 Mins: Wed. 9:15 p.m.
RAI-TV, from Milan (tape)

Disappointing first stanza of a new series featuring Line Renaud failed to meet expectations and drew values from names at hand. It looks only a no-no lightweight entry for RAI.

Line Renaud, though handling her emcee role with savvy, was handicapped by indifferent material. Her choice of songs, almost all with Italianized lyrics, failed to establish her undoubted personality. Same w.k. hits of hers in the original might better have set the pattern, to be argued by the functional translated items. Also burdened by text was Paolo Poli, usually an easygoing performer, while Renato Carosone, a longtime local vocal favorite, made an okay comeback after some years in retirement.

Guest stints provided happier moments, notably Matilde & Paul Dauprat and their puppets and—for most of his segment—Alvaro Alvisi, a new comedian with possibilities.

George Reich dancers were pro all the way, but along predictable lines. Technical credits were good. Hawk.

Foreign TV Followup

Armchair Theatre

Breaking away from its usual policy of new plays in a modern idiom, ABC-TV revived Karel Capek's 25-year-old "Power and Glory" for this segment of "Armchair Theatre." The Czech writer's piece was a propagandist peace plea, and its theme was thus appropriate for the Easter period. But time had treated it roughly, and little remained, but a sledgehammer tract in which characters and plot were little more than machinery for carrying the message.

Dr. Galen (Paul Daneman) was an obscure medico who had found a cure for a deadly plague afflicting his country. But he would not disclose it unless the powers-that-were, symbolized by The Marshal (Alfred Marks) and an arms manufacturer, Baron Storno (Alfred Burke), would stop preparations for an aggressive war. Why, said Capek, should the doctor strive to heal while the politicos would murder millions in battle?

While sympathizing with the play's motive and purpose, something more was needed to make it dramatically viable. Passionate outpourings of fervent pacifism were not enough. And conviction was not helped by the comic-opera trappings of a police state—which looked as if Ruritania had been taken over by Fidel Castro. Climax was that the Marshal caught the dread disease himself, decided to accept the gallant doctor's demands for the sake of his health—but Dr. Galen was beaten to death by war-hungry citizens on his way with the medicine.

Best performance came from Alfred Burke, as the only mutineer, and Paul Daneman and Alfred Marks could do little for roles that were mere mouthpieces for points of view. Jonathan Alwyn directed Leonard White's production efficiently, but, for all the urgency of its theme, the play was too much of its time to impress another generation. Otta.

Television Playhouse

The husband with a roving itch is a staple ingredient of comedy, and "The Two-Seater Bachelor Days," contributed by Paul Jones to Associated-Rediffusion's "Play of the Week" skein, showed that it still packed a fine amount of nourishment. It was a gay and polished piece, helped by zestful thesping and nimble direction by Michael Currer-Briggs.

While his wife (Zena Walker) was giving birth to their first child in the hospital, the husband (Dinsdale Landen) went astray. His buddies gagged about his loss of freedom, he saw the prospect of a snappy sports-car fading, and brooded about the good times he would be missing. So he engineered a flirtation with the girl (Ann Bell) in the apartment upstairs, claiming that he was separated from his spouse. It could only be an interlude, and it was resolved genially, with the wife being heavily forgiving and the gal taking it coolly.

The familiarity of the notion was effectively disguised by the scribe's witty dialog and observant plotting, which only faltered in some cumbrous dream sequences, with the husband acting out his wish-fulfillments as a masterful caveman. Dinsdale Landen, who might easily have lost sympathy in a situation with mean undertones, dodged the danger with skill and elan. Ann Bell clicked, too, as the offbeat gal—a performance in striking contrast to her Jane Eyre austerity on the current series for the rival web. And Zena Walker was chubbily knowing as the wife. Otta.

It's a Square World

This was a specially-assembled segment of BBC-TV's zany comedy show, selected as the web's entry for the Golden Rose of the Montreux Festival. The skein makes a good choice for an international audience, as many of its gags are visual, using trick-shots of cartoon animation and live action, and this technical enterprise is its chief asset. Tele Follow-Up Comment

Ed Sullivan

The entertainment staples of Canada, particularly Toronto's O'Keefe Center, seem to be U.S. talent. Of late this auditorium has no lack of U.S. headliners and Ed Sullivan added a few more with his first live telecast out of the U.S. mainland since he went on the air.

Sullivan took a fairly representative show with him, which included two Canadian Acts, and a set of South-of-their-border performers topped by Connie Francis and Jack Carter. Carter localized his comedy to make it germane to the situation, and a lot of his lines had spontaniety and freshness for the local audience particularly when he spoke of local situations ad made some levity out of U.S.-Canadian relations.

Miss Francis is a solid name on this hemisphere, and she measured up to her renown with a trio of tunes that went over well. There was more singing with Jan Peerce, who did a pair from musical comedies and an aria from "Carmen." He seemed too heavy for the lightweight numbers, but was in his element with Bizet. More singing came from Abbe Lane who Latined out a pair of tunes with bonus rump dancers in the background. Xavier Cugat, first on camera, gave zing to the accompaniment.

The Canadian elements were headed by Wayne & Schuster, who put over a few laughs with Wayne impersonating a hippie. Other act was Les Jerome, a pair from Canadian tv, who did a briefie with a pair of impersonations. They knew how to satirize the modern crop of singers and did well. Jose.

Today

Friday (26) NBC-TV's "Today" varied the morning menu slightly by doing a two-hour tencept for the usual news breaks) piece called "Buster Keaton Revisited." It was a fun visit, although Buster Keaton will probably never seem the same now that people have had heard him talk.

Producer Al Morgan and his crew—they have a liking for show biz themes—used hundreds of feet of priceless (literally and figuratively) footage from Keaton silent films. Opening was a quickie, from "The Goat", of Keaton coming into the foreground on the cowcatcher of locomotive. His deadpan was seen again in especially funny bits from "The Cops," much of which was seen a while back when the Keaton humor was incorporated in a feature documentary playing theatres called "The Golden Age of Comedy."

Keaton as a living breathing, 1963 being was appealing but not all that funny. It's not that he was not funny at all. He just wasn't as funny throwing pies at "Today's" Jack Lescoulie as he was throwing flour at Fatty Arbuckle and Al St. John. After the impression the silent Keaton has left on the public, words and sounds will never go with that magnificently haunting face. Nevertheless, Keaton proved a pleasant, informed man, and his brief, sky commentaries for the various clips aired were helpful.

Regardless of the cherished impression forever lost by words, the particular NBC-TV memorabilia was worth seeing. Art.

Portrait

Eileen Farrell, American-born soprano who has clambed to the operatic summit in recent years, came through with great charm and individuality on CBS-TV's "Portrait" last Wednesday night (24). While the general run of divas strive to establish their identity by displays of great temperament and hence are as alike as cans on supermarket shelf, Miss Farrell has become a rarity through her normality.

Under astute questioning by Harry Reasoner, Miss Farrell registered as a warm human being, utterly without pretentions, filled with humor and unobscured by her art. Married to a N.Y. City policeman and living on Staten Island with her family, Miss Farrell has demonstrated the possibility of putting motherhood ahead of a demanding career.

Miss Farrell recalled her how as a professional singer on CBS Radio back in 1939 and traced her subsequent emergence as one of the great dramatic sopranos of the current opera scene. Miss Farrell also sings jazz and, as the half-hour's highlight, she sat down at the piano to sing a few bars of the blues to illustrate the point. Herm.

NBC White Paper

There was a day, not long ago, when the "NBC White Paper" was the superlative example of documentary filmmaking. The Irving Gitlin creative projects unit at NBC News, which was at its best when Al Wasserman did the actual producing and writing, brilliantly packaged a series of penetrating stories. But lately the depth is gone from the work of creative projects insofar as their "White Paper" programs are concerned.

Wasserman and Gitlin used to see to it that questions were answered; they'd plug away at sources until answers came or until it was obvious that the sources were incapable of answering honestly or intelligently. Furthermore, Wasserman would see to it that the scenes were meticulously edited.

Because Gitlin constantly seeks new approaches, he set another of his producer-writer men, Arthur Zegart, to using a technique now in cultivation. Instead of leaving the questions to reporters, Gitlin & Co. have been able to capture colloquies by the people actually involved in the stories.

Despite the wastage, they do it well, but the technique overshadowed on Sunday (28) the truth, whatever it was. Zegart's assignment was "The Business of Gambling," and the focus was on legalized machine gambling in four southern Maryland counties. It was exciting the way Zegart and his fellows, using highly mobile portable synchronized camera and sound equipment, were able to catch the characters involved, but it was emotional excitement. The intellect got only partial stimulation.

As close sometimes as Zegart seemed to be getting to the core of the gambling problem, he never got there. One did not know who was telling the truth, who was right, who was practical. The candid camera technique made for a good story, but not a totally penetrating or telling one. Art.

Close-Up!

In a tidy 30 minute documentary that was just long enough for its subject, John Secondari caught the essential frustration and the economic trials that beset the rural newspaper editor today and have made him one of a vanishing breed. Along with a portrait of Landon Wills, one of 2,000 such editors left in the U.S., Secondari succeeded in epitomizing the mentality of McLean County, Ky., where Wills publishes his weekly. The program was as rewarding for its revelation of grassroots attitudes as for its insights into the plight of the smalltime publisher "caught in a world of bigness."

Wills was an excellent focal point as a publisher who has dedicated himself to an unprofitable newspaper in a grassroots community that resents his finer education and resists his unconventional viewpoint. He is socially an outsider, disliked by many for what he has printed, but admired by most for his journalistic courage. His wife has to support the family through her teaching, and their six sons help out at the paper on a part-time basis while Wills himself, trapped in a labor of love, does everything from typesetting to selling ads.

The cameras sampled residents for their opinion of the editor, and in telling how they felt the various interviewees exposed the intellectual makeup of the community. Many testified that they hated Wills' thinking—his endorsement of Kennedy, for instance, and his editorials supporting the right of a Catholic to become President (one citizen thought that smacked of Communism)—but the majority felt that the McLean County News was an indispensable part of their lives.

Bucking narrow-mindedness, social ostracism and financial loss from ever-diminishing advertising prospects, Wills learned as heroic as the country doctor—the true professional who could better his personal lot elsewhere, but stays on where the need is. Secondari's video essay was a tribute and an appreciation as well as a report on a contemporary rural condition. Les.

Chicagoans don't just sit there...

The people of Chicago take an active interest in what they see on CBS Owned WBBM-TV. Which is just the way WBBM-TV wants it.

Recently, as part of a first-of-its-kind experiment in two-way communication—station to viewer, viewer to station—Television 2 broadcast "The Strangling City," a candid exploration of Chicago's commuter facilities. People were requested to fill in and mail back "ballots" (printed in all four Chicago metropolitan newspapers and widely distributed at central commuter points on the day of the broadcast) which probed attitudes toward public transportation...and which could only be completed by those tuned to the broadcast; Chicago viewers responded en masse, including more than 13,000 people who had some helpful suggestions to offer for improving present commuting facilities.

The two-way exchange of ideas—this is the true meaning of communication. Too, it is a prime example of one station's unceasing efforts to pioneer new ways to serve its community better. But then, Chicagoans expect no less from the television station that has been their consistent favorite year after year after year. ●WBBM-TV well mirrored his beleaguered position.

His problems were microcosmed in his declaration of conscience that broadcasting's first and foremost interest is to "serve the people of America—all of them—and, next, to benefit the private interests of the proprietors of the industry."

Collins also offered a glance at another root of his differences with the Texas rebels. "Screaming and fulminating in general invectives about government usurpation of private freedoms in such situations may be warmly satisfying to the spirit," he continued, "but in truth they are little more availing in making meaningful progress than a child's temper tantrums. They make big headlines, but little headway."

That is a paragraph shows the difficulties of a business association headed by a politician. As shrewd as they may be behind their cash registers, most business types know no better defense against government than "screaming and fulminating in general

FCC to Move Presto

Washington, April 30.

FCC action in the WNDT-TV-NBC imbroglio is likely by the end of this week or early next, a spokesman for chairman Newton Minow disclosed Monday (29).

"This matter won't drag on indefinitely," the spokesman averred.

Commission staff has sent general inquiries to WNDT officials in New York concerning the allegation NBC donated $100,000 to the tuneless station on the condition it would change some programming to avoid competing with NBC shows. Queries to NBC are also possible, although they had not been made Monday.

FCC has thus far garnered its information on the matter from the press, a Commission spokesman said.

FCC is expected to act after receiving replies to the questionnaires.

the situation warrants it, more than that.

There undoubtedly will be variations by each of the tv webs, but by and large the above pattern seems to be the one they'll all pursue. NBC-TV plans to cover the final orbit, reportedly the others too.

Besides the final night coverage, NBC-TV is making plans for a nighttime special. Of course, if Cooper gets off May 14, a Tuesday, there will be no need for a special preemption by that web since Chet Huntley does a weekly Tuesday half-hour.

NBC-TV reporting team will be Frank McGee and Ned Ryan from N. Y., Merrill Mueller and Roy Neal at Cape Canaveral, the launching site, and John Chancellor will front the NBC Radio coverage.

ABC will handle the pool coverage and this time, for the first time, the astronaut will be accompanied on his flight by a small tv camera that'll transmit back at once.

and "The Three Mixed Up Mouses" brigades.

Arthur Pierson has joined the company as associate producer on entertainment product, and head of its industrial films division. Walter Barr, a producer-director with Leo Burnett & Co., joins H-B June 1 as head of its live action commercials division. Robert Carlson, formerly with Walt Disney and UPA, heads the company's animated commercial division, and Hal Styles has been named chief of the firm's new syndicated commercial branch, which plans 200 telefilms.

In addition to production coin, H-B rakes in about $500,000 for production design for licenses merchandising various H-B cartoon characters. Also, "Flintstones" and "Yogi" comic strips are carried in 230 newspapers by the McNaught Syndicate, and H-B do the production work. H-B's "Flintstones," "Yogi" and "Huckleberry Hound" cartoons are shown in 41 foreign countries.

Barbera explained the company is diversifying into many other fields because "we're going into markets that have never been touched." He said H-B has received as much as $75,000 for a half-hour telefilm, and pointed out few sponsors can afford this kind of coin. Consequently, H-B policy is to prepare shows with "tailor-made" budgets depending on what a sponsor can afford.

Two years ago the animation trend in tv fell flat on its face, Barbera recalled, but that doesn't mean the interest is not still there, he added. He said he finds agency and sponsor reps in N. Y. very receptive to good ideas for animation series, and some such deals are now in negotiation.

When H-B was formed in 1957, the company had four on its staff, including the two partners. Now they have 230 on the payroll.

Heise, manager of channel 4, the Milwaukee Journal station and the NBC affiliate here, said that if "people's television" is what America is to have, "then people's television you must expect it to be . . . and it will reflect their likes and dislikes, what they can comprehend and what is beyond them.

"Every person of common sense knows that people of superior mental constitutions are bound to find much of television intellectually beneath them. If such fortunate people cannot realize that it is their hearts they despise popular pleasures and interests, then, of course, they will be angrily dissatisfied with television. But it is not really television with which they are dissatisfied. It is with people."

Brit. Parliament Debates 'Clause 7' Locking in $50,000,000 Tax Rap

London, April 30.

The House of Commons Standing Committee is today (Tues.) debating Postmaster General Reginald Bevins' substitute for the lay now notorious Clause 7 in the new Television Bill which he was introducing last Thursday (25) when the House adjourned.

This idea, if the PMG gets his way, is aimed to raise in around $50,000,000 a year via a levy on ad revenue. But if pre-debate soundings are in any way accurate the Tory PMG is due for a severe drubbing under the wrath of critics and indie tv champions on both sides of the chamber.

The amendment is being discussed in the Committee stage of the Bill's course through parliament to the statute books. If it succeeds it will supplant the present ad duty which brings in some $50,000,000.

Under the terms of the amendment the first $2,500,000 of a company's ad revenue in any one year would be exempt from any duty. But the following $50,000,000 will be taxed at a whopping 20½%, meaning above that figure to the stratospheric 40%. The cash will be paid to the Independent Television Authority which will then pass it directly on to the Treasury.

In the past week trade unions and tv dealers have joined the already powerful school against the proposals. D. M. Keegan, director of the Radio and Television Retailers' Association, wrote to the PGM expressing disquiet.

"While we certainly would not deny that some new formula must now be found for controlling commercial television in order to accord with popular demand and the high standards of broadcasting which have always obtained

FCC's Tobacco Ban Protested

Washington, April 30.

Protests from the turf have come in on FCC's proposed ban of broadcasting horse races unless the purse exceeds $50,000.

Bob Slater, proxy of the Florida Turfvertisers Assn., formally protested to FCC charging the proposed regulations were "discriminatory in that they will prohibit the racing fan from being able to receive the legitimate news of his sport."

"Other sports that admittedly are the medium of much greater illegal wagering are in no way restricted," Slater said.

The proposed ban, Slater said, would do "irreparable damage" to horse racing.

Sunshine Vs. Kern

blind" was another focal point of controversy between Sunshine and Kern. Kern said that he personally suggested a man-to-man interview with Baldwin, but that he objected to Sunshine's proposed addition of Belafonte without a "broader-based panel including other distinguished Negroes." Kern said that Sunshine "threatened to blast me out my chair, out of my job and out of the industry. He also accused us of cheating him out of revenue from syndication. Hours later he gave us an ultimatum—that if we didn't concede to his wishes he would march into our studios on Wednesday night with Rivers, Baldwin and Belafonte and the press to coerce us to tape the show."

Kern said he was inviting Baldwin and Belafonte to appear on the station, with two or three other leading Negroes, without Sunshine, whose "Open End" shows, according to Kern, frequently had been edited for "derogatory libelous and obscene remarks." Kern said that Sunshine had been alerted in March that his contract would not be renewed but, out of courtesy, WNEW-TV refrained from announcing the termination until Sunshine found a new home.

Sunshine denied every claim made by Kern. Sunshine said that his contract gave Kern no right to suggest topics or panelists for "Open End." Sunshine asserted that he was paid $1,250 a week to deliver a two-hour package whose contents he alone determined, guided only by the formal canons that we would conform to accepted moral standards of broadcastings and the NAB code. Sunshine said: "Kern never suggested a subject for discussion and never selected a guest for 'Open End.' He did, however, once successfully foist Jay Kennedy, one of his cocktail party acquaintances, onto one of my shows on American women." Kern, on this point said that Kennedy is an authority on women and is now in the process of writing a book on that subject.

Where Kern said that any subject can "be discussed in the open marketplace of ideas," Sunshine enumerated a dozen topics, including American Foundations, the flabby American, smoking and cancer and advertising, that were suggested as "Open End" topics and turned down. In one case, Sunshine charged, a critical reference to the defacing of the American landscape by billboards was excised from an "Open End" show. Sunshine ascribed this deletion to the fact that Metropolitan Broadcasting is corporately related to the Foster & Kleiser outdoor advertising firm through the parent Metromedia company. Sunshine also enumerated a list of guests who have been censored on "Open End." These included Jackie Robinson, James Carey, Norman Mailer, William Buckley, Sol Hurok and Rudolph Nureyev.

Sunshine stated that he was proceeding with the taping of the Baldwin-Belafonte show tonight (Wednesday), using the facilities of the Videotape Center instead of WNEW-TV's. He's offering this show as a public service to any N. Y. station that wants to run it and will distribute it in syndication via NTA, which normally handles the "Open End" sales to non-Metropolitan stations. The show is now being carried on about 25 stations.

Kern's press conference was unsettled by the discovery that Ralph Ginsburg, editor of Eros magazine and one of the panelists on the censored "Open End" show on sex, was present. Ginsburg declaimed loudly against Kern all through a shouting match with Metromedia public relations v.p. Phil Cowan. "Just lay a hand on me," Ginsburg warned. Nobody did until Ginsburg was escorted out of the room by a policeman. He returned for another surprise outburst against Kern and then was finally planted on the sidewalk outside where he collared departing reporters.

Fireman's ABC-TV Slot

In a move to strengthen the commercial base for its news and documentary shows, ABC-TV has named William W. Fireman as director of sales in this area. Fireman joins ABC from CBS Radio where he has been assistant general sales manager for the past two years.

In other sales appointments, James T. Shaw Jr. became assistant daytime sales manager for ABC-TV, working under Yale Roe.

Religious Leaders in Broadcasting Warned Time for Action, Not Words'

"Religion has too long hidden behind the moral cloak of Newton Minow instead of speaking out in our own voice with our own concern for better radio and television," was charged at a meeting of the National Federation of Temple Brotherhoods by Rabbi Maurice N Eisendrath in New York last week It's understood that Minow has asked the various religious groups to assist the FCC in upgrading the quality of television

Dr Eisendrath said that the "interest of religious organizations extends not only to religious programs but also to programming as a whole" "It should be part of our faith calling as religionists, of all faiths to summon the moral resolve which will help the American people to put its own house in order and to make the television screen worthy of a place of honor and dignity in that house"

Dr Eisendrath said that the time has come "for action, not words" He proposed that religious leaders and their national bodies hold a three-faith conference on religion and the media with broadcasters and advertisers to be structured similar to the recent National Conference on Religion and Race in Chicago.

"There is already a trend," he said, "which is discernible on the part of religious leaders to assume the obligations imposed upon them in this respect. It is, however, only beginning and the major faiths have not yet spoken out with sufficient clarity to improve programming."

He said that "religious leaders should particularly speak out on matters such as the rating scandal in the broadcast industry. It is bad enough that advertisers rely solely upon the dollars and cents value of programs to be sponsored by them, but it becomes worse when the methods used to determine the value of the program to the advertiser are tained with improper procedures, if not by outright fraud. Religious leaders have a duty to urge the sponsors of the programs, the advertising agencies, and the broadcasters to clean house.

The religious leader said that the networks have made "considerable noteworthy advances in public service broadcasting" but he alleged that the scheduled resignation of Minow was coupled with the reduction in the amount of time allocated to public service broadcasting next season.

"This cutback cannot be allowed to stand," he asserted. "I rebel

NBC-TV Daytime Biz

NBC-TV claims it booked just about $6,500,000 in daytime business the past few working days, but the one account that seems to have given the network its biggest boost was Ralston-Purina's $910,000, because it reportedly comes from a berth at CBS.

Armour is pouring its entire daytime budget into NBC-TV next fall —$1,850,000, the web reports. That equals 116 quarter-hours. Thomas Leeming is spending $500,000, Kimberly-Clark $700,000, Borden $195,000 and Heinz, in a big outpouring for NBC daytime, $1,000,000.

purposes. On the other hand, some of the conferees representing producers, networks and advertising agencies felt that they had authoritative consultation and guidance and that they could therefore feel safe about matters about which they felt not competent to judge."

While the reps of the American Psychiatric Association expressed willingness to aid producers as they have before on an informal basis by recommending individual psychiatrists who were available for consultation to programs asking for their aid, many of the broadcasters still felt that there is continuing need for a central information office for psychiatric and psychological info and data to which a writer or producer with a specific problem could go and then be put in touch with the right pro.

Urge Group of Seminars

Another suggestion was made that a group of seminars, similar to this one, be held in New York and Hollywood to further educate writers, producers and organizations on the problems of mental health, attitudes, etc.

On the whole there was general agreement both by the MD's and the broadcasters at the Conference that the early problems which had faced "The Eleventh Hour" had been resolved by its producers with skill and responsibility, and there was considerable praise for them.

The consensus was from all sides that, whatever the organizational or professional or administrative problems involved in setting up consultation for mental health programs, it is vital to have at all times authoritative consultation, and the entire field must be handled on the air with special tact and understanding, particularly when dealing dramatically with mental illness.

There was also much agreement that the psychiatrists should not be as sensitive as some of them have been as to the way in which they are portrayed on the screen. They should generally be shown as knowing, helpful experts, but not as one dimension stereotype heroes who can do no wrong and have no human failings.

Cite Benedt, Too

One of the small group reports noted that there was "some resentment by broadcasters at the meeting with good reason over the fact that they have received much criticism for the occasional lapse in handling psychiatric material, but no credit whatever for years of effort in improving their presentation. This improvement, it was pointed out, has been going on in broadcasting since 1956 and much progress has been made in eliminating negative references, improving the image of the mental patient, the mental hospital and the psychiatrist, and in avoiding numerous representations of the mentally ill and similar stereotypes that were commonplace in popular entertainment 20 years ago. It was agreed that a great deal has been accomplished and that the broadcasting industry should indeed be commended for its efforts and its achievements.

In closing sessions, a frequently advocated proposal was that the National Association For Mental Health, be delegated by the psychiatrist and psychologist as a kind of clearing house for radio and television and press-writers, producers, etc., for information and suggestions.

Dr. Menninger in his closing remarks again praised the broadcasters for their efforts generally on behalf of mental health. "We need you," he said. "It's only through you and the press that the public is going to know the mental health story. We work with one person, you work with millions."

Dr. Menninger also again called for continued action by the mass media in the mental health campaign, and underscored that the need for public information will be even greater in the decade ahead.

Among other broadcasting and advertising reps at the two-day conference were Meagan Bayles, head of Sullivan, Stauffer, Colwell and Bayles, Philip Cohen, vp of BBC&B, Robert Sweezy, Director of the NAB's Code Authority, Dick Pack, WBC vp for programming, Richard Arlett of NBC's "Today" staff, and writers Roger Hirson and Alvin Boretz.

Whatever continuing problems may exist between broadcasters and the psychiatric profession, it was the almost unanimous feeling of everyone present that the conference had made a unique and positive contribution to both broadcasting and the medical professions, and would eventually prove to be of great value to those they both serve—the public. In fact, the general theme song of the conference could well be "getting to know you . . . ", with both the tv pros and the medical pros agreeing that the friendly, constructive face-to-face meetings and frank discussions had helped each to acquire a more realistic and understanding image of the other.

New York, maybe the tv producers have taken their lead from the stage, where the importance of the playwright and his work have long been recognized."

There's one twist to the coastal discrepancy, says Miss Southgate. "Put a western-indoctrinated tv producer to work in Manhattan and it isn't long before he succumbs to the eastern influence. He begins to think the play may be the thing after all. But switch it around and it becomes curiouser. Set an eastern-indoctrinated producer to functioning out west and he remains the same. He goes right on behaving as if the play were indeed the thing and the man who wrote it someone to be taken decidedly into account."

Specifically, Miss Southgate has high respect for Herbert Brodkin ("Nurses," "Defenders" and the upcoming "Espionage" hour). "Mr. Brodkin," she says, "has a flair for recognizing good writing. He also knows the kind of scripts he wants and what's more, he wastes no time in buying them. Out on the Coast, well, it seems to require endless time for these shows to make up their minds."

cause of its excellence, has cultural value.

Atlanta Journal did not go along with Carow and Gov. Sanders. Friday (26) paper commented editorially:

". . . If this means a narrow interpretation of the educational field, such as limiting educational tv stations to formal classroom presentations, we could not disagree more. The Federal Communications Commission . . . has imposed no such limit.

"Gerry Appy . . . is on sound ground in insisting that the (etv) stations need not stick to classroom topics at night. They do not usually show films that are solely for entertainment, he said, but sometimes they use films of such a quality that they have strong cultural value.

"While these stations have heavy obligations to avoid trivia and any film that is without value, they have no obligation to avoid motion pictures merely because they compete with what is on commercial stations.

"The FCC has made this clear. Educational tv is not merely for formal lectures in a classroom atmosphere; it is for education."

Atlanta Journal, an afternoon paper, and Constitution, a.m. sheet, are owned and operated by Atlanta Newspapers, Inc., which owns WSB-TV and WSB-AM&FM.

There's a Wright way to run a radio station

(Of course, there are other ways, but we don't subscribe to them.)

Who are we? The Wright Broadcasting Company. Our new station, and the San Francisco market's newest station, is called KPAT. KPAT began broadcasting on both AM and FM in the Bay Area on Monday, covers all of the principal population centers within the nine Bay Area counties and, naturally, is run the Wright way. That, of course, means wonderfully entertaining music, intelligently programmed in truly uninterrupted segments twenty-four hours each day, commercials only on the quarter-hour break daytimes and on the half-hour from 7:00 PM until dawn, excellent news, informative service and almost no other talk at all. Certainly none that's aimless or inane. In short, KPAT is a reticent radio station, responsibly aware of the needs of its audience, realistically aware of the needs of its advertisers. But why go on? You undoubtedly know the Wright way of doing things. And in the unlikely event that you don't, by all means write us in Berkeley, California, for a copy of "Prospectus: A Preliminary Statement Concerning KPAT." Or ask your Robert E. Eastman representative. He'll be happy to tell you how right you are to place an order today on the Wright station in America's sixth market: KPAT AM and FM.

lination that did so well in trips to Seattle World's Fair and Plymouth Plantation, Mass. This time, though, the team got detoured on a road trip that left much to be desired.

Replacing another westerner (Laramie) Barnaby's venture was neither for youngsters nor adults. He and Pitschke went out to the Phoenix, Arizona area and spent a week visiting, seeing, talking, and experiencing the warmth of the southwest. The hour-long stanza attempted to capture this mood, but failed. What could have made a good half hour show was extended into an hour-long dull vehicle. There were some good sequences. Sheldon's talk with a one-time prospector at the ghost town of Vulture, in which the methods of finding gold were explained, was both educational and attention-holding. A toddler's class in horsemanship, a visit to a saddle shop, and the rodeo also had merit, as did Pitschke's sequence treatment of costumes. Dubbed-in studio dialog, however, with Sheldon and Deming lacked authority, and Sheldon doing commercials added to the too-much of one-man theme.

THE PAPERBACK PLAGUE

WAGA-TV, Atlanta (Blair)

Obscenity is a magic word when it comes to attracting attention or racking up a tv show rating. And when the word got around that this program, one in a series labeled "Project 3," would deal with obscene literature in the paperback book field, WAGA-TV made sharp inroads into the second half of "Ben Casey" on the rival outlet.

Station news staffer Jim Ansel conducted this one. He got leaders, including educators, authors and politicos and others to join in discussions. The study was limited to paperback books, since they are the source of most protests against dissemination of filth, smut, obscenity, pornography, or what have you via news stands.

Dr. Thomas H. English, professor of literature at Emory U, decried the easy availability of "sex thrillers and sleazy westerns and the like" in drugstores, but pointed out that nearly all the classics now are available in paperback form. Others appearing on the program favored "strong laws" as a curb, but Mayor Ivan Allen said:

"Responsibility of developing the proper concept of morality in the minds of our young people is something that addresses itself over and beyond the strongest laws we may pass," Mayor Allen said.

Herbert Dyer, executive secretary of the Georgia Literature Commission, said the commission has done a good job and 85 to 90% of the state "has been cleaned up," but added: "I think that probably 75% of the people of Georgia doesn't know what's on the news stands."

Ken Bagwell, general manager of WAGA-TV, Storer outlet here, made one of his rare appearances on camera to editorialize. After praising paperback book industry for the good it has done, he said: "... We strongly submit that this industry is being plagued by certain books that serve no literary purpose. These books are written for profit and purposely pelted with sex and perversion and violence because that's what apparently sells ...

"Channel 5 charges the parents of Atlanta with the responsibility for allowing this to happen ..."

achieved is in the "Hellzapoppin" groove.

The entry was largely composed of highlights from earlier shows, but the choice was often debatable. Such items as anchorman Michael Reutinc's lecture on the Common Market, during which cartoon figures moved around in a frenzy behind him, were miniature classics of their kind, as was the thumbnail of a Saudi Arabian official watering his window-box and striking an oil gusher.

On the other hand, other ingredients tended to outstay their welcome. The climax, in which a farcical war was fought with band instruments instead of weapons, needed the slimming treatment, and there were a couple of blackout sketches which missed their point. Reutine, with grave and normal demeanor, made an effective contrast with the uninhibited surrealism of the material, and support, especially from Bonnie Barber, Benny Lee, and Maggie Fitzgibbon, was okay. James Gilbert directed briskly, and the film was cunningly edited by Jim Latham.

BBC-TV copped first prize at Montreux two years ago with "The Black and White Minstrel Show." "It's a Square World" is just as individual in a different way, and should certainly get a mention in dispatches.

mit that television has not been a formidable, positive force for good in American life. Too often, when the balance sheet is struck, it has been a veritable invincible factor in the widespread exploitation of crime and violence. It has glamorized the patterns of behaviour which are anti-social. It has contributed to the cheapening of human life and the desensitization of the American people. It has pandered to the lowest and meanest tastes and emotions of the public. It has encouraged the American people to squander our leisure in a sodden, bleary-eyed stupor and to wallow in sticky sentimentality, sadism, callous cynicism, in violence, vileness and vice."

Rabbi Eisendrath noted that the FCC was limited in exercising higher standards in broadcasting due to the restrictions of the Federal Communications Act which embodies the principles of the First Amendment. He pointed out that ultimate power does not rest with the Commission but with the broadcaster.

The religious leader said he "despises censorship" and that he does not believe that religious organizations which advocate censorship are serving the public. "Yet, the truth is that we already have censorship in television—harsh, rigorous and destructive. It is the censorship of the dollar, unchecked by the public interest. It is the censorship of timidity which, because of the dollar dictatorship stifles the most controversial social ideas. We must be as troubled about what does not appear on the screen as about what does."

documentary-makers for the more personalized, dramatic efforts.

Exec producer of ABC-TV's "Close-up" series which ends its highly-praised three-year run next season, Rosenfield said that his division would not retreat from its commitment to tackle the vital issues with the utmost honesty. Out of the 10 hourlong documentaries to be turned out by Rosenfield's staff next season, several will be done in the traditional "Close-up" style. The rest, however, will probe the human angles of the news that have compelling meaning for audiences. "Our contribution to public education," Rosenfield said, "will be to reach the mass audience on a level they have established for themselves. Perhaps we can stimulate them to go a couple of steps higher with our efforts. But if we don't reach them at all, we are just voices in the wilderness, righteous but futile."

unusual 'outside contacts' with our homes will become known to us—witness the fact that a number of our families routinely reported Harris' staff contacts, despite admonitions (of those in employ of Congress) not to tell Nielsen.

"We have reviewed and tightened security measures with respect to our confidential materials. As a practical matter we very much doubt that outside influences can exert material or continuing effect on the normal listening-viewing habits of families in or out of the sample."

Administrative control of field work detection of cheating—"Controlling the quality of field work is a traditional problem in research or surveys work. We have every reason to believe that the vast majority of our field work is handled honestly and in accordance with prescribed procedures . . . The dissident fieldmen who testified were discharged for failure to observe prescribed procedures, or for being 'absent-without-leave' (for not properly notifying the field supervisor or field manager about taking time off to vacation in Paris). The third man departed under fire for poor work, even though he had been given a great deal of help because he claimed he was ill.

"Field compensation averages $6,407 per year, plus a leased-car (or equivalent recompense for men who prefer to drive their autos) plus travel expenses. The publicized $1.25 per hour figure applies to trainees, not to men on field routes. Additionally, the hourly figure distorts the picture by omitting the fact that we guarantee compensation for 40 hours per week, whether the fieldman works 30 hours or 50 hours per week."

Effects of meter performance variations by field route—"The hearings highlighted audimeter performance variations by field route. It is true that some men yield above 'par' and others below par performance.

"The inference was drawn that this results in distortion of the representativeness of in-tab samples. The fact is that the characteristics of the in-tab samples by market sections vary but one to two points from the gross samples. These comparisons are (and have been) available to clients."

Allegation that only "abnormal" homes would accept recordimeter—"Recordimeter sign-up rates during recent years—80% plus—suggest that such homes are scarcely abnormal. As further rebuttal to the Congressman who made this allegation, we cited the findings of our 1962 study, 'An Appraisal of Nielsen Station Index Samples in Metro Areas of 32 Major U. S. Markets.'"

Hypoed ratings—"NSI pioneered four-week and eight-week (average week) station reports to minimize the effects of 'ratings week' hypoing.

"Nonetheless, the opportunity remains for 'special effort' programming and promotions during four and eight - week measurements, especially in smaller markets in which reports are provided only two or three times per year . . . Two solutions—more reports per year (at added costs) and an all-out industry effort to ventilate special programming or promos during measurement intervals (the FCC could discourage such by requiring that stations report such effort concurrent with such effort)."

Summit sessions, that had the ad execs in by groups through the three days, also went into area geography, ratio adjustments, editing procedures, sample specifications and other technicalities.

explained, is the stations' failure to keep their pledge to function in the public interest. It's on this premise that their licenses were granted, he pointed out.

Capp charged that the offending stations, "operating in the public disinterest," are guilty of "glorifying violence and brutality and, by such devilishness, they ruin many children."

However, it's conceded by Capp that "tv programming generally is greatly improved." And even though he condemns the tv industry for its alleged "illegal practices" it's the first place to go "if a person wants to make money," he said.

"Money was my primary factor in deciding recently to make a stomach remedy tv commercial," he told his interviewer. "Also, it made me famous at last. Kids now point me out on the street and say 'there's the man who belches.'"

Capp made known that he himself watches tv, but prefers "the late, late show because the movies are innocent."

British TV Tax

in this country," he wrote, "we feel that the imposition of a levy of this type might well destroy the whole fabric of the commercial television industry with the result that it will become a declining medium of 'entertainment and gradually lose popularity with the viewing public.

"The effect of the tax on some of the smaller companies which are already operating marginally would, we feel, be disastrous and would tend to produce a more monolithic structure than already obtains in the industry."

Sixteen unions, represented by The Radio and TV Safeguards Committee, have also come out against the proposed levy on the grounds that it will result in an end to ambitious programming and will lead to "heavy redundancies."

In the meantime charges by the Opposition that there was evidence of bias being introduced by the strong newspaper interests in some commercial tv companies, was refuted in a Standing Committee debate and an amendment by the Labor M. P. for north Sunderland, Frederick Willey, to divorce newspapers and tv and bar newspapers from holdings in program companies, was defeated by 17 votes to 11.

In fighting off the amendment Postmaster General Bevins said that newspapers were not interested in tv as a means of influencing public opinion, but as a means of making money.

Speaking on Clause 7, he insisted that it was not the government's intention to take unreasonable amounts away from these companies. The proposed levy was not a tax and it was absurd to talk of it as discriminatory or penal taxation. A levy on gross ad receipts was proof against evasion.

Bevins said the companies had to be left with adequate funds to enable them to produce high-class programs and earn reasonable profits. "The purpose of this new clause," he said "is simply to secure that program companies appointed by the Authority as from 1964 pay adequate rentals for the concessions they will enjoy. No one can conceivably argue that the existing rentals are sufficient. They are not fixed on a commercial basis."

He said the government had estimated that if the levy had applied in 1962-63 it would have produced $46,200,000, reducing the net profits of the companies before tax from $86,000,000 to around $38,000,000.

"I am assured," he added, "that there is very good reason for supposing that over the years advertising revenue on television will grow. The best estimate I can make is that in 1964-65, the first year of the levy, gross advertising receipts will reach well over $224,000,000 and, in spite of the very generous allowances for companies' increasing costs, the profits before tax should be maintained at about $36,000,000 to $40,000,000.

BIG B'WAY PUBLISHING SPREAD

Diskeries' B'way Angeling Dips to 500G

The record companies took a more cautious approach to investing in Broadway musicals this past season. The total angeling figure came to under $500,000, which is a far cry from the $1,000,000-plus that of Columbia Records, alone, put into Broadway the year before. This season Col limited its legitimer backing to $40,000 in "Nowhere to Go But Up" (a flop) and $20,000 in "The Beast in Me," which opens on Broadway next Tuesday (14).

The leading diskery investor this season was Warner Bros. with a $200,000 stake in "Hot Spot." RCA Victor had $150,000 in "La Bohe," which folded out of town, and Capitol had $80,000 in "Sophie," which closed after a week's run on Broadway.

Jazz Beats Out 'Ooky Pooky' Music On Shari Lewis' TV Nursery Show

Jazz, which has expanded from the cellar club to the concert stage, is now moving into the nurseries. Prime mover in introducing the big beat to the youngsters is Shari Lewis, whose weekly kiddie show on NBC-TV (in 100 markets) stresses jazz licks that the moppets can dig.

Main aim of Miss Lewis and her musical director Lan O'Kun is to get away from the traditional Old English form of kiddie music that's pegged primarily on march time and over-used saccharine sounds, which they refer to as "ooky pooky music."

"Too many adults," says Miss Lewis, "have a condescending attitude about the kind of music that should be presented to children. They want to hold to the old-fashioned musical patterns instead of keeping in time with the times."

O'Kun's jazz approach is far from being in the progressive or cool mold but he does feed on jazz references to give the kiddies a swinging and rhythmic sound from the material he takes from Broadway shows as well as the new pop product except for rock 'n' roll. Helping him put across the jazz beat are such hip sidemen as Eddie Safranski, Tony Gottuso and Barry Brewer.

Pointing up the kiddie acceptance (as well as their parents) to the jazz sound is the strong sales pull of Miss Lewis' albums. Her latest, "Shari In Storyland," is a top seller in the juve market for RCA Victor and has copped a Grammy nomination for the upcoming National Academy of Recording Arts & Sciences awards.

There is some opposition, though, to this jazz orientation.

ASCAP Victor In Infringement Suit Vs. KGON, Port.

The American Society of Composers, Authors & Publishers last week settled copyright infringement actions which six of its members had brought against radio station KGON, Portland, Ore. Under the settlement, the station signed the standard form of ASCAP license, retroactive to Jan. 1, 1963.

The station had counterclaimed in the infringement suits charging the plaintiffs and ASCAP with violation of the antitrust laws. Under the settlement, judgment has been entered in favor of the plaintiffs and ASCAP dismissing the counterclaims with prejudice. The judgment was signed by Chief Judge Gus J. Solomon of the Federal Court in Portland.

The antitrust counterclaims dismissed are identical with counterclaims filed by radio stations in 15 infringement actions brought by ASCAP members in the Federal courts in the State of Washington. Ronald A. Murphy, Seattle attorney, represented KGON and also reps many of the radio stations being sued in Washington. The plaintiffs were represented by Koerner, Young, McCulloch & Denendorf of Portland.

Barbershop Quartet Assn. Has No Color Bar But It Does 'Screen Members'

Toronto, April 26.

The barbershop quartet association has no color bar in its constitution and "no official and written barrier" but "we do screen our membership and don't want bums." So said Hugh Palmer, Canadian chairman of the Society for the Preservation and Encouragement of Barber Shop Quartet Singing in America, which will hold its Silver Jubilee convention in Toronto during July 3-6, when some 5,000 barbershoppers will be present.

Commenting on the recent uproar in Ottawa among the Sweet Adeline chorus group in which more than half of the 40 femme members resigned over the dismissal of Negro singer Lana Clewes, Palmer admitted that there is no Negro chapter among the association's 670 North American chapter groups and there is no Negro member among the org's 30,000 North American affiliates (Canada's total membership is around 2,000).

Palmer's experience is that "not once in the past 10 years has any Negro, or Negro chapter, applied to us for membership." On the question that if a Negro did apply, how would his application be met, Palmer said, "I don't think he'd find it easy to join, not any more easy than he'd find it to do a great many things in Canada and the United States. It's just the same as any organization. We don't throw our doors wide open."

Teeters' Demands Cut Mpls. Park Concerts

Minneapolis, April 30.

Because the Musicians Union has asked for a wage increase for its participating musicians and will continue as co-sponsor only if a third sponsor is obtained, in addition to the municipality and itself, the Park Board has cut the number of ensuing summer open-air park concerts from 37 to 32. This will mean an expense of $22,794 for local taxpayers, considerably less than that of last summer.

However, the board announced that it's leaving the door open to further negotiations with the Musicians Union and these could lead to rescission of current action and scheduling of additional concerts.

Hitherto, the Musicians Union has contributed $10,000 annually itself for these summer outdoor park concerts.

MORE FIRMS IN LEGITUNE RACE

By MIKE GROSS

The Broadway musical field will be getting its widest publishing spread in recent years during the 1963-64 season. So far, seven different music publishing houses will be represented by legituners slated for production next season —and the lineup is expected to grow before the September kick-off.

For a long time, legituner publication had been virtually a private affair among just a few key publishers. In the past couple of seasons, however, new firms have been opening the doors to Shubert Alley and there are plenty of others continually spouting for properties and writers to give them their shot at the Broadway boards.

For example, Don Kirshner, who recently became veepee of Columbia Pictures-Screen Gems' music publishing operation, has already voiced his desire to step into the showtune arena, and Emil La Viola, who took over as general professional manager of Shapiro, Bernstein last month, said that he, too, intended to steer some of his firm's activities to Broadway.

However, already set for a show score drive next season are Chappell, E. H. Morris, Frank Music, Music Publishers Holding Corp., E. B. Marks, Tommy Valando, and Howie Richmond. They'll handle publication of 25 tuners that have been announced for production next season.

Richmond a Top Newcomer

One of the top newcomers in the show field is Richmond. He hit it big for the first time this season with the scores for "Oliver" by Lionel Bart, and "Stop The World I Want To Get Off" by Anthony Newley & Leslie Bricusse. Both were entries in Richmond's BMI setup. For next season, so far, Richmond has the Hugh Martin & Timothy Gray musicalization of "Blithe Spirit" on tap. It'll be in his ASCAP firm, Cromwell Music.

E. B. Marks, which returned to the Broadway fold this season with the Anne Croswell-Lee Pockriss score for "Tovarich," will further bolster its showtune catalog next season with the scores for the Alexander Cohen productions of "Barnum" and "Baker Street." Both scores are being written by Ray Jessel & Marian Grudeff.

Marks is also committed to a score of a new musical entitled "Slave Story" by Oscar Brown Jr. The music is being written by jazz composer Alonzo Levister, currently under contract to Marks Music, who collaborated with Brown on the story.

E. H. Morris, repped on Broadway this season with "Little Me" by Carolyn Leigh & Cy Coleman, and "Hot Spot" by Mary Rodgers & Martin Charnin, already has six tuners in the hopper for next season. They are: "Zenda" by Vernon Duke-Sid Kuller-Leonard Adelson; "Golden Boy" and "The Golden Spur," both by Charles Strouse & Lee Adams; "The Matchmaker" by Jerry Herman; "The Yearling" by Michael Leonard & Herb Martin, and "Bajour" by Walter Marks.

Chappell's 5 Musicals

Chappell, long dominant in the show field but comparatively quiet this past season, has five musicals on tap for the 1963-64 season. They are: "I Picked A Daisy" by Richard Rodgers & Alan Jay Lerner; "The Rainmaker" by Harvey Schmidt & Tom Jones; "Sleeping Prince" by Noel Coward; "Her Master's Voice" by Ulpio Minucci & Guy Gilbert, and "A Girl To Remember" by Jule Styne - Betty Comden - Adolph Green.

Tommy Valando, who has been leading BMI's way to Broadway, has six musicals in the works. They are: "Student Gypsy" by Rick Besoyan; "Tevya's Daughters" by Jerry Bock & Sheldon Harnick; "Is There Intelligent Life On Earth" by Michael Brown; "Simon Says" by Fred Ebb & Paul Klein; "Teresa" by Fred Ebb &

Diskeries Digging Into Vaults For New Rides on Pop Singles

With the record industry currently hitting an upbeat in single sales, the disk companies are broadening their sources for material. In addition to the rhythm & blues and country & western numbers that have moved in on the pop output, the diskeries are keeping a closer eye on the output from overseas as well as digging into the archives for new workovers of old material.

Epic Records is a case in point: The diskery, which copped its first 1,000,000-seller last year with Bobby Vinton's "Roses Are Red," is currently riding high with another Vinton single, "Over The Mountain (Across The Sea)." The tune was published several years ago by Arc Music and received some disk action pegged primarily for the juve market. The Vinton updating has given it an adult pull and last week it became the title of his new album release.

The Vinton LP follows the pattern established with "Over The Mountain" in that it takes old tunes for a new ride. Included are "Silhouettes," originally recorded by The Rays; "Earth Angel," first recorded by The Penguins; "The Great Pretender," one of The Platters' first hits, and "Sincerely," a yesteryear click by The Moonglows.

Another of Epic's current picks is "Sun Arise," written and sung by Rolf Harris, an Australian. The record was a hit on the Coronet label in Aussieland, and through Nat Shapiro, director of international artists & repertoire for Columbia Records, it was acquired for the Epic subsid. Harris plans his first trip to the U.S. next month to promote the disk as well as his album, also released here on the Epic label.

Representing Epic's vault revival is "Hambone." The disk, currently getting a new spinning ride, was cut by Red Saunders & His Orch in 1952 and released on Okeh, Epic's rhythm & blues subsid. Sandy Becker, radio-tv performer in New York, started using the tune as a theme on his two children's programs and it developed to such an extent that Epic pulled it out of the morgue for a new release.

Another oldie to get a new ride on Epic is "Ever Wonderful" recorded by Ted Taylor. He recorded it years ago for the indie Duke label. And another foreign tune entry scoring here for Epic is Buddy Greco's "What Now My Love." The song has been a top hit in Europe in an etching by one of its writers, Gilbert Becaud.

House Hearings Start on Celler's 3 Jukebox Bills

Washington, April 30.

The House Copyright subcommittee will begin two days of hearings Thursday (2) on three bills of Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) which would repeal the jukebox copyright exemption.

Subcommittee chairman Rep. Edwin E. Willis (D-La.) said the proposals offered a middle of the road approach in the long standing fight between the performing rights societies and jukebox operators.

Willis asserted that the legislation gives the warring factions an opportunity to work something out after 15 years' brawling before his subcommittee.

Scheduled to testify in favor of the bills are Rep. Celler, U.S. Copyright Office chief Abraham Kaminstein, and reps from the American Bar Assn., ASCAP, BMI, SESAC, Operators Music Inc. and the American Guild of Authors and Composers.

Opposing the legislation will be Rep. George Miller (D.-Cal.), reps of the Music Operators Assn. and jukebox manufacturers.

Rep. Celler has offered three alternatives to the jukebox imbroglio. The first simply makes juke operators liable for infringements under the Copyright Act when playing copyrighted music.

The second Celler bill establishes a three-man Office of Performing Rights Trustees, appointed by the Attorney General. They would determine the amount of royalties and supervise their collection and distribution.

The third proposal requires a $5 annual license fee for each jukebox. Money would be collected and distributed by the U.S. Copyright Office.

EMC Corp. Buys Five H'wood Waxing Studios

Hollywood, April 30.

Five recording studios in Hollywood have been acquired by EMC Corp. Price of the multiple transaction was not disclosed by Morris Halpern, prexy, but last year's sales exceeded $1,000,000.

In the group buy were Radio Recorders, Conway Recorders, Radio Recorders Equipment Co., MP-TV Services and Universal Recorders of California. Combined facilities will be operated as Universal and Radio Recorders division of EMC.

EMC's 22 studios in Hollywood and St. Paul make it the largest independent recording company in the country, according to Halpern. St. Paul studio produces and duplicates tapes, records and films for use in teaching foreign languages and in industrial and commercial sales and training programs.

Naming of Gary Walker As Nashville Head First Step in S-B's Expansion

The appointment of Gary Walker to head Shapiro-Bernstein's Nashville office is the first step in the expansion program designed by Emil La Viola, who took over as firm's general professional manager last month.

Walker, who comes to S-B after a stint as general professional manager for Lowery Music, plans to stimulate new activity for the S-B catalog in the Nashville area as well as for its BMI subsid, Painted Desert Music.

Though based in Nashville, Walker plans to cover the south and southwest to scout new talents in the writing, producing and recording fields. This is in line with S-B's plot to open new doors for those who are not presently located in the music scene's N.Y.-L.A.-Nashville axis.

La Viola's next move will be to strengthen the firm's operations in the California market. Within the next several months, La Viola and firm's topper, Leon Brettler, plan to spend considerable time on the Coast to lay the groundwork for the buildup.

Harnell's 'Bossa,' Smith's 'Hobo,' Gleason's 'Themes' Top New LPs

JOE HARNELL: "MORE JOE HARNELL—MORE BOSSA NOVA POPS" (Kapp). Joe Harnell made a big disk score last year with his bossa nova treatment of "Fly Me To The Moon." This is the second LP in which Harnell leads some standout pop items into bossa novaland and he won't have any trouble keeping the programmers and the disk buyers on his side. Harnell's keyboard touch is again in the fore but the beat, which, following his arranging cues, also does a lot to enhance the bossa beat. Some of the numbers that show up extremely well in the bossa dressing are "True Love," "There Will Never Be Another You," "Our Day Will Come" and "Lullaby Of Birdland." All sides, however, have a big programming potential.

JIMMY SMITH: "HOBO FLATS" (Verve). Jimmy Smith's jazz organ established itself solidly in the disk field last year with vibrant interpretation of "Walk On The Wild Side" and a click LP called "Bashin'." This new package will extend the Smith cult. Even with the big band support, Smith continues to hold the swinging lead which reaches down to the jazz roots and which comes up with an authentic earthy quality. "Walk Right In," "Blueberry Hill," "I Can't Stop Loving You" and "Trouble In Mind" are some of the sides that will pull this package to the top.

JACKIE GLEASON: "MOVIE THEMES—FOR LOVERS ONLY" (Capitol). The "For Lovers Only" theme, which has done so well for Jackie Gleason's musical enterprises on LPs in the past, is again used to advantage for this roundup of film melodies. In addition to the king-size string sound, which has trademarked his previous efforts, Gleason has embellished the lushness with the quietly romantic tones of an English horn, accordion and vibes. The arrangements by George Williams, and the spotlighted trumpet solos of Pee Wee Erwin and the sax solos by Charlie Ventura do a lot to make the themes from "Lawrence of Arabia," "Taras Bulba," "Mutiny On The Bounty," "The Third Man" and such individual pic tune entries as "My Romance," "The Man That Got Away," "Call Me Irresponsible" and the 1962 Oscar winner, "Days Of Wine And Roses," topflight entries in the mood music field.

THE VENTURES: "SURFING" (Dolton). The surf set has another platter geared to their sport with this outing by the Ventures. It's a solid rocking set of original tunes with lotsa rhythm and verve. As an added teaser for the surfers, there are liner notes by Coast surfing champ Ilima Kalama. The Ventures get a solid sound from their electric guitars and driving rhythm section which should excite teen terpers with its hefty emotional pull. The surf craze has been catching hold around the country for the past couple of years and, with summer almost here, it promises to be bigger than ever. So do its disk equivalents.

THE J'S WITH JAMIE: "HEY, LOOK US OVER" (Columbia). The J's With Jamie (one gal & three guys) are a sprightly singing group that has a good chance to take hold of the album market with this debut package. They are a youthful sounding bunch, but they deliver with a savvy that's marked with professional efficiency. Their range is wide and they shift from such rhythmic showtunes as "Hey, Look Me Over" and "A Lot Of Livin' To Do" to the folksy "Cotton Fields" and to the romantic "Touch Of Your Lips" and "Smile" with an ease that makes the spinning easy and enjoyable. Hoyt Jones' arrangements help keep up their spirits.

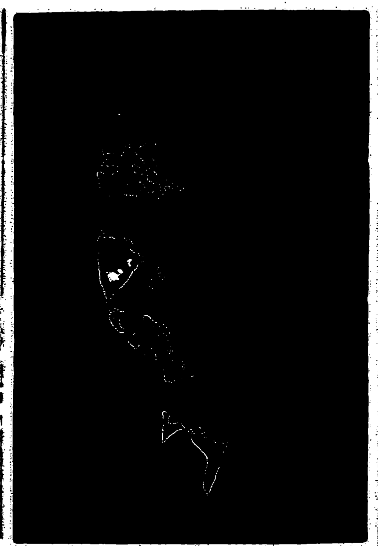
GEORGIA BROWN: (London). Georgia Brown follows her all-Kurt Weill album with a specialized treatment of an assortment of composers that gives her a chance to cover a wide vocal range. She has a flamboyant style that adds new values to the material at hand. Cole Porter's "Every Time We Say Goodbye," Noel Coward's "Mad About The Boy," Harold Rome's "Too Soon" and Frank Loesser's "Spring Will Be A Little Late This Year" are some of the songs to which she brings lotsa spinning enjoyment. And for those who can't get enough of the work she does in the current Broadway tuner, "Oliver," there's a new and interesting rendition of Lionel Bart's "As Long As He Needs Me" for good measure. A trio of conductor-arrangers (Ian Fraser, Garry Sherman, John Keating) fit all the musical elements into their proper place just for her.

JULIE LONDON: (Liberty). The most interesting point made by this package is that there have been quite a number of really solid songs to crack through the pop hit lists in the past several months. Julie London treats them as if they already are part of the standard repertoire which is a deserved treatment. Songs like "Call Me Irresponsible," "I Wanna Be Around," "I Left My Heart In San Francisco," "My Coloring Book" and "The Good Life" are substantial items with lots of performance years ahead of them. Right now, they're doing okay in Miss London's hands. Her ballad caress is still one of the warmest vocal pitches on disks today and should heat up the turntables at home and in the radio studios.

YVES MONTAND: "PARIS RECITAL" (Philips). Yves Montand's recent concert at Le Theatre D'Etoile in Paris stays very much alive in its disk transposition. In fact, this is one of his best recording jobs in many years and should win back many fans who've gone elsewhere in the interim. The stress is on romance, of course, and Montand pours it out in a way that each song appears to be a personal message for the listener. The lyrics are in French but they's a splendid folio in the package that contains the English and French lyrics as well as some standout photos of M. Montand.

CARLOS MONTOYA: "FLAMENCO ANTIGUO" (RCA Victor). Carlos Montoya's fine flamenco work on guitar is given another topgrade packaging in this roundup of old gypsy melodies and some original compositions which he adapted from traditional melodies. The album has an authenticity and a musicianly flair that will please the flamenco fans. "Tango Antiguo" and "Sequiriya" will probably get the programming spotlight.

THE BOSSA TRES: (Audio Fidelity). Brazilian-styled jazz has some fine exponents in three tooters known as the Bossa Tres who recently came to the U.S. from their Rio de Janeiro balliwick. In this, their first U.S. recording, Luis Parga (piano), Edison Machado (drums) and Sebastio Neto (bass) show that they have a flair that will attract the Yanquis who've already been conditioned to the bossa nova beat. Their style is lively, imaginative and swings with an exuberant air. Most of the set is made up of authentic bossa nova imports but even George Gershwin's "Somebody Loves Me" and the Ned Washington-Bronislau Kaper pic song, "Green Dolphin Street," come off well in the bossa dress.



LAWRENCE WELK

In His Newest Dot Album Salutes "1963's EARLY HITS"

BOBBY GORDON: "WARM AND SENTIMENTAL" (Decca). Programmers will do their listeners an injustice if they pass this one up. It's warm and sentimental, as indicated by the title, but Bobby Gordon's clarinet and the big string orch in support make it more than just another mood music entry. The clarinet sound is lyrical and moving and sustains the title's mood as do such tunes as "All Alone," "I Cried For You," "I'll Be Seeing You," "I Can't Give You Anything But Love" and "You're Nobody 'Til Somebody Loves You."

SAL SALVADOR ORCH: "YOU AIN'T HEARD NOTHIN' YET!" (Dauntless). Sal Salvador is a big band maestro who believes that there's room for big bands on the music scene. This package may help his cause. In addition to being big, his band is swinging and loaded with exciting musical shadings. All these elements, as well as some good vocalistics by Sheryl Easly, bring a new impact to the likes of "On The Street Where You Live," "The Song Is You," "All The Things You Are" and some interesting compositions by Salvador himself.

Top Singles Of The Week

(The 'Best Bets' of This Week's 100-Plus Releases)

RUBY & THE ROMANTICS . . . . MY SUMMER LOVE
(Kapp) . . . . Sweet Love and Sweet Forgiveness
Ruby & The Romantics' "My Summer Love" (Rosewood) is a pretty ballad with a lyric idea that will have wide appeal to the Coke set with its romantic and seasonal pegs. "Sweet Love and Sweet Forgiveness" (Rosewood*) is another arresting ballad with a choppy rhythm format niftily handled by this songstress and her combo.*

DAMITA JO . . . . HOBO FLATS
(Mercury) . . . . Drama of Love
Damita Jo's "Hobo Flats" (Nelsen†) is a swinging slice in a traditional blues format in which this songstress works very effectively to nab spins on all levels. "Drama of Love" (Sylvia†) is a slow-moving ballad with a pretentious lyric.

JOHNNY CASH . . . . RING OF FIRE
(Columbia) . . . . I'd Still Be There
Johnny Cash's "Ring of Fire" (Painted Desert†) provides this fine country singer an interesting ballad conception which his rendition could give wide pop circulation. "I'd Still Be There" (Johnny Cash†) is a more conventional backwoods entry also handled very well.

DON ROBERTSON . . . . IT'S HARD FOR A KING TO STEP DOWN
(RCA Victor) . . . . Life Goes On
Don Robertson's "It's Hard For A King To Step Down" (Robertson) is a straightforward ballad with a good teen-slanted lyric which this singer projects effectively in a multiple-tracked vocal. "Life Goes On" (Americus†) is another well produced ballad with a good lyric idea that could catch on.*

THE PHOENIX SINGERS . . . . OLE GATOR
(Warner Bros.) . . . . Run, Come, See Jerusalem

THE TORNADOES . . . . LIFE ON VENUS
(London) . . . . Robot
The Tornadoes' "Life on Venus" (Ivy) is still exploring that outer-space theme which clicked for them with "Telstar." This sequel is closely patterned after their initial hit and could repeat. "Robot" (Ivy*) is more music with a contemporary instrumental sound.*

FRANKIE AVALON . . . . CLEOPATRA
(Chancellor) . . . . Heartbeat
Frankie Avalon's "Cleopatra" (Debmar) is another pop entry pegged to the upcoming 20th-Fox film. This one has a fair lyric idea which this singer delivers in pleasing style. "Heartbeats" (Mar Nick†) bounces along nicely and could cop plenty of play.*

THE CORVELLS . . . . . ONE IS SUCH A LONELY NUMBER
(Cub) . . . . The Joke's On Me
The Corvell's "One Is Such a Lonely Number" (Chapter†) is an interesting ballad with an offbeat melodic idea and a well-written lyric delivered in savvy blues style by the lead singer of this combo. "The Joke's On Me" (White Castle†) is an okay rocking ballad with a typical teen slanted message.

BOBBY RYDELL . . . . WILL YOU BE MY BABY
(Cameo) . . . . Wildwood Days
Bobby Rydell's "Will You Be My Baby" (January†) is a pretty ballad with a light beat and a well-written lyric handled very stylishly by this singer against a colorful instrumental and choral background. "Wildwood Days" (Kalmann) reverts back to a more conventional juve-angled groove.*

MEL TORME . . . . GRAVY WALTZ
(Atlantic) . . . . My Gal's Back In Town
Mel Torme's "Gravy Waltz" (BMI Canada†) is a smoothly swinging, cleverly written entry which puts this veteran performer back into pop contention. "My Gal's Back In Town" (Bengbo-Hullabaloo†) is another good side with a bluesy quality.

ESKEW REEDER . . . . JOHNNY LITTLE
(Everest) . . . . A Tear
Eskew Reeder's "Johnny Little" (Tune-Kel†) impresses as a hard-driving rhythm entry with a beat and lyric that should draw spins from the rocking set. "A Tear" (Landix†) is an okay ballad handled very effectively by this singer with ensemble support.

MARV JOHNSON . . . . HE'S GOT THE WHOLE WORLD IN HIS HANDS
(United Artists) . . . . Another Tear Falls
Marv Johnson's "He's Got The Whole World In His Hands" (Chappell) is noteworthy chiefly because of the fact that it has put this religioso standard into a bossa nova rocking beat. It's way-out enough to break through. "Another Tear Falls" (Eleventh Floor*) is a neat ballad with a good lyric and strong pop chances.*

MARTIN DENNY . . . . . MORE "MONDO CANE" THEME
(Liberty) . . . . Little Boat

JUDY BATES . . . . KISS ME BABY
(Mey) . . . . Go Out With Him
Judy Bates' "Kiss Me Baby" (Roxbury) is a cute, catchy rhythm slice dished up in a bright style that will corral attention in teenage circles. "Go Out With Him" (Roxbury*) is a tear-drenched ballad with a lyric that doesn't quite carry conviction.*

Dick Clayton's 'Blacklist Festival'

WINS deejay Dick Clayton aired a sort of "Blacklist Festival" as the lead segment of his weekly hour-long folk music disk show Sunday (28).

First three spins were by The Weavers (with Pete Seeger), Joan Baez and The Greenbriar Boys. Clayton also closed the show with The Weavers (again a disk with Seeger in the group) and Miss Baez. Taking it a step further, the station plugged the show Sunday morning with promos billboarding only The Weavers and Miss Baez.

The Weavers and Seeger, who for years have had exposure problems because of personal political beliefs, are currently the centre of a controversy because of ABC-TV's policy in barring them from the web's current "Hootenanny" show. Miss Baez is the performer who brought the whole matter to public attention by refusing to do "Hoot" without The Weavers and Seeger on the talent roster. The Greenbriar Boys, a trio, were among the first to follow Miss Baez's lead in turning down the show for "blacklist" practices.

Clayton's show had several spot sponsors, including 7-Up, Tom McCann shoes, Noxema and others, but a station spokesman says they were run-of-station, i.e. fell within the hour via rotation. And Clayton made no reference whatsoever to the current hassle.

About the tight juxtaposition of non-"Hoot" talents on the show, the spokesman said, "draw your own conclusions."

Besides the folk show on Sunday, Clayton, a satte and whimsical jock, handles the morning stint for the New York Westinghouse station.

2 Minor Issues Stalemate Dickerings Between Chi Local 10 & Ravinia Fest

Chicago, April 30.

Negotiations between Local 10, Chicago Federation of Musicians, and the Ravinia Festival Assn. for this summer's al fresco concert series were stalemated last week over two issues that both union and association spokesmen consider minor in terms of greater obstacles overcome in negotiations to date.

The players want the 65 members of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra used for Ravinia's two-week ballet season to be selected on a rotation basis. The association says the conductors must have the right to choose their own musicians.

The other issue remaining is that the musicians want two consecutive days off during the week instead of the present every-other-day schedule.

Negotiating teams for both Local 10 and the Festival have carefully avoided the sort of eyeball-to-eyeball confrontation that nearly wrecked the regular Chicago Symphony season last fall. So far, both Local 10 prexy Barney Richards and Ravinia Assn. chairman (and adman) Earle Ludgin have eschewed the bitter public wrangling indulged in by former Local 10 chief James C. Petrillo and Orchestral Assn. head Dr. Eric Oldberg.

The following has been agreed upon so far: (1) A three-year contract with a $170 a week minimum for 1962, $175 for 1964 and $180 for 1965. Last year's minimum was $150; (2) Extension of the season to seven weeks, which is a week longer than 1962; and (3) Utilization of all 105 available members of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra instead of the 94 used last year.

Biksl Gets $5,700 In Vancouver Concert; Beats Lingo Barriers

Vancouver, April 30.

Theodore Bikel grossed $5,700 in a one-night folksong stand on Thursday (18) at the 2,800 capacity Queen Elizabeth Theatre. Concert was scaled from $1.75 to $4 and the 1,900 enthusiastic Bikelniks in attendance made it an artistic triumph for the actor-singer.

Bikel, who is on the last leg of his yearly concert trek, did some two dozen folk songs from Countries around the world. Accompanied by bassist Jimmy Bond, he was onstage for more than two hours. His energy is prodigious, and his acting ability plays a big part in the effect he creates with his audience through the sheer power of his personality.

Bikel's folksinging philosophy, stemming from a consuming interest in people everywhere, finds its deepest personal expression when he closes with a set of the songs closest to his heart from his own roots. Here, despite unfamiliarity of the Yiddish tongue the most of the audience, it is Bikel the man, not the polished artist, who breaks the language barrier.

Appeals Court Reverses Pupi's 15G Award Vs. Paar

The Appellate Division of the N.Y. Supreme Court last week set aside a jury's award of $15,000 to bandleader Pupi Campo in a libel action against Jack Paar. Suit stemmed from a published statement by Paar that he had dismissed Campo from his late-night NBC-TV show because the bandleader "lacked talent."

The jury's verdict was handed up to Justice Samuel M. Gold two years ago. The higher court set aside the award and ordered a new trial.

Name Hammond Col Talent Chief

John Hammond is taking over as head talent scout for Columbia Records. He's been upped from his post as producer in the pop artists & repertoire department to Director of Talent Acquisition.

In his new spot, Hammond will be responsible for scouting, auditioning and recommending potential talent for the Columbia, Epic and Okeh labels. He'll also maintain liaison with artists, managers, agents and representatives of night clubs, concerts, music festivals and motion pictures. In addition, Hammond will arrange and conduct auditions throughout the country.

Hammond will also direct the administration and review of musical material submitted to Columbia, and will serve in an advisory capacity to the Archive series of classic jazz performances, a series which he created. In addition, he'll select participants for Col's Teen Talent Auditions.

Scouting is no new gig for Hammond. Over the years he's been responsible for the breakthrough of such music biz names as Benny Goodman, Meade Lux Lewis, Charlie Christian, Billie Holiday, Stuff Smith, Red Norvo and, more recently, Aretha Franklin.

FOOTBALL TAGGED DISKS SCORE FOR SCOT LABEL

Glasgow, April 30.

Disks with titles about local football teams are paying big dividends here. Thistle Records of Glasgow, outfit headed by Scot singer Robert Wilson, has a heavy advance order for a new disk of "Glasgow Rangers," with "That's The Team" on the flipside. Orders have poured in from football fans who haven't even heard the number.

Both songs are traditional Auld Lang Syne melodies with new words by local tunesmith John McKenzie. Disks for the Scot football teams of Celtics, Dundee, Dundee United, Hearts and Hibernians are already on sale.

Henri Colpi Terms on Pic Music a Savvy Work For Buff & Technician Alike

Paris, April 30.

Books dedicated to film music are extremely rare. That alone makes this new French book on the subject of interest. The fact that it is incisive, intensive and well documented is a further asset for Henri Colpi's "Defense Et Illustration De La Musique Dans Le Film." It not only has appeal for film buffs but also is worthy of the libraries of filmmakers and technicians.

An English version of this 455-page tome would not be amiss either. Printed in Lyon, France by the Societe D'Edition De Recherches Et De Documentation Cinematographiques, it's priced at $9.50 and is acceptably illustrated.

Colpi was a film editor ("Hiroshima Mon Amour" and "Last Year in Marienbad,") who turned director in '61 with "Such a Long Absence" and copped the grand prix at the '61 Cannes Fest with it. If cursory in some aspects, since it is based only on films seen in France, the book still has a solid fund of music lore, beginnings, applications and sketches of its leading practitioners.

Colpi goes into pic music as accompaniment in silent pix, the advent of sound and its later use on dramatic pix, comedies, operettas, musicals, musicians' lives etc. He makes the point that the old saw about film music being unheard is a good thing is strictly not so. Good film music, he asserts, can blend with, underline or counterpoint the images and also be heard to good advantage if it is right and well used.

He also points out that some film music can stand on its own while other scores, even though fine in context, cannot. He amply studies music in a myriad of films to show how it is helpful and why and how rules just do not apply. It is a collaboration between the director and musician that pays off in the end.

Book, well indexed and annotated, does not seem to have any obvious errors except perhaps for bracketing the late Will Rogers along with Gene Autry and Roy Rogers as a singing cowboy. He also goes deeply into Hollywood film music.

Colpi lists the important film music men from all countries. Book, well written and controversial, shapes a unique tome for film libraries everywhere. Mosk.

Weavers' 15th Anni Carnegie Dualer Keys Progress of Folkmk Gold Rush

By MIKE GROSS

The Weavers' 15th anniversary folk fete at New York's Carnegie Hall tomorrow (Thurs.) and Friday, is really a celebration for folk music itself. The Weavers have made folk business a big business and even though there are folk singers like Joan Baez, who sings barefoot on the stage of in N.Y.'s plush Philharmonic Hall, its popular purveyors have become a well-heeled lot.

In the pre-Weavers days, folk music was primarily an esoteric art form belonging to a small egg-head group and minor record labels. The click of The Weavers' "Goodnight Irene" and "Tzena Tzena" on Decca in 1950 sparked a renaissance of folk music and the music record business hasn't been the same since.

The folk spread now takes in virtually all areas of show business, reaching from coffeehouses to college campuses, from impromptu hootenannies in Greenwich Village's Washington Square Park to staged concert hall presentations, from a fraternity party sing to network tv, and from cellar clubs to the top of the bestselling disk charts.

Beaucoup Chartists

It's obvious from the rash of new groups continually being given a disk showcasing that the folk rush has not yet reached its peak. Almost every youngster with a guitar and a new twist to an old song is getting a hearing and the way the market has opened up for folk music, there's apparently room for plenty more. The album and pop singles bestseller charts have been loaded with a varied array of folk artists and record labels in the past couple of years. Among the leaders have been Joan Baez (Vanguard), Peter, Paul & Mary (Warner Bros.), Kingston Trio (Capitol), Limeliters (RCA Victor), New Christy Minstrels (Columbia), Chad Mitchell Trio (Kapp), Highwaymen (United Artists), Smothers Bros. (Mercury), Theodore Bikel (Elektra), Rooftop Singers (Vanguard), Harry Belafonte (RCA Victor), and many others. The fact that folk music had made an indelible mark on the music scene was firmly evidenced last year.

Hollywood, April 30.

Composers & Lyricists Guild is negotiating for an AFL-CIO charter, Georgia Hanni, CLGA exec director, said the discussions are aimed at "bringing the CLGA into the family of creative unions now affiliated with the House of Labor."

A CLGA pact with the major film producers expires next year.

Baez-Seeger D.C. Gig SRO $22,550

Washington, April 30.

Folk singers Joan Baez and Pete Seeger played to a capacity crowd of 7,850 at the Washington (D.C.) Coliseum last Saturday (27). It was their first joint appearance together in major city and their third appearance together in two years.

The gross was $22,500, with tickets scaled from $4 down to $1.75. The 6,000 reserved seats were sold out four days before the concert. The remaining 1,850 seats, located to the rear of the performers, went on sale Friday (26) for a general admission price of $2.50.

Vanguard Records recorded the concert, which was produced by Manuel Greenhill and Harold Leventhal. The concert was locally managed by Stanley-Williams Presentations, a Washington booking and management office in business less than a year. Saturday's concert was the firm's first venture in a hall over 1,500. Next for Stanley-Williams is a booking of The Clancy Bros. & Tommy Makem slated for May 18 in Lisner Auditorium.

'IN PRAISE OF MUSIC' TOPNOTCH ANTHOLOGY

Maxims, axioms, apherisms, thoughts and speculations "In Praise of Music" (Orion Press; $4.95) have been affectively collated in an attractive anthology by Richard Lewis. Himself a composer, a former assistant editor of Musical America and member of the Music Critics' Circle of New York, he now teaches at the Walden School in New York and at the Northern New Jersey Art Center where he also lectures on chamber music.

Sources from the Talmud, Plato, Confucius, St. John Chrysostom through Martin Luther, Goethe, Schiller, Emerson, Poe, Baudelaire, Schopenhauer and Rabelais up to T. S. Eliot, Edna St. Vincent Millay, Edith Sitwell, James Joyce and Gershwin have given expression to their "Praise of Music."

In an attractively departmentalized volume—odd-size, being more oblong than the conventional book—Lewis' galaxy of excerpts dealing with his theme is attractive reading. Book can be picked up at any point and prove rewarding. It is a permanent tribute to men and woman who had a way with words and have indelibly recorded their poetic an philosophic feelings about music. Abel

Disk Man Parnes Forms Indie Producers Group

Sid Parnes, veteran manager-publisher, is launching a new record releasing operation to be known as Independent Producers Group (IPG). The organization will represent indie record producers on either an exclusive or non-exclusive basis.

According to Parnes, IPG would not engage in recording on its own but will handle all production, promotion, sales and finance matters for the indie producers leaving them free to concentrate on their recording activities.

Distribution of IPG releases is being set now and it's expected to have its first release ready by May 15.

Red Tape Ties Up AFN Plans to Air 'Top 10' To GI Audience in Europe

Frankfurt, April 30.

Plans to broadcast a "top 10 record hits" on American Forces Network to the GI audience in Europe have been stymied. The soldier network had hoped to broadcast weekly the 10 most popular songs in the U.S., or the top 10 bestsellers on the shelves of the Post Exchange and Air Force Exchanges in Europe.

However, a mountain of military red tape has forced the project out of action. The military stations overseas are permitted to broadcast only the special Department of Defense U.S. Government transcriptions—and thus would not be allowed to repeat the same record that is number one on the PX counters.

(One reason for this is that the Defense Dept. transcriptions have been cleared with the musicians' unions in the U.S. and thus can be played sans royalties. The German organization which represents ASCAP here, GEMA, has long had a fued with the AFN over the royalties it claims are due its members for airings of the music on the GI network.)

Also, AFN is forced to show "nonpreferential treatment" of the 60 or 70 new transcriptions that it gets weekly. Thus American servicemen and their families living in Europe generally get to hear a top U.S. record about three weeks after it has climbed into the hit category in the States.

An official from the military post exchange system, however, noted, "There is a basic difference between what they play and what we have on the shelves." Military exchanges try to order disks as soon as they feel the records will climb into top popularity in the States, and time needed between ordering and getting the record onto the shelves in the European PXes is about four or five weeks.

Inside Stuff—Music

John McCormack was "careless" about his recordings, the late Irish tenor's philosophy being that he could "still sing the number"; as a result, "the family" has not a complete collection of the platters. So his son, Vatican Count Enrol McCormack told an interviewer, Fitzgerald Smith, in an exchange from a hotel outside Dublin, broadcast over NBC Radio's "Monitor." Asked why "you did not follow singing as a career . . . you have a good voice," the younger McCormack recalled, "I sang once on Erin Radio. The next day, the three nationally circulated newspapers reported, "His voice is not as good as his father's." Added the son, "I could have told them that, the night before."

RCA Victor International and the foreign representatives of WGN-TV in Chicago have teamed to put the Chicago Symphony Orch's 'Great Music' From Chicago" tv series on a global run. Latest to pick up the series is Japan's NHK (Nippon Hoso Kyokai), a nationwide network owned by the Japanese government. NHK will telecast 10 of the "Great Music From Chicago" programs beginning in April. Other countries already carrying the series are Argentina, Canada and Mexico. George H. Fruiting, manager of Victor International's merchandising and liaison service, expects more countries to pick up the series in the near future.

Phil Maxwell, founder and moving force behind the Chicago Tribune's Chicagoland Music Festival for the last 33 years, asserts that reports of the demise of the annual fest after this year are premature. "Our attendance has been holding, but the cost of producing the shows has been going up," Maxwell said. "If this year's show is the success we expect it to be, we will definitely have another next year. We think it's worth saving." Show is being "tightened" to two and a half hours this year, will start a half hour earlier (7:30 p.m.) and top price has been upped to $3 from last year's $2 top.

Tribune music festival has played to 2,701,000 persons since its inception, and has starred Al Jolson, Gladys Swarthout, Alec Templeton and other top names over the years. It is held in the 100,000-seat al fresco Soldiers Field, and has in recent years been drawing about 30,000 customers.

Roger Englander, producer-director of tv's N. Y. Philharmonic Young People's Concerts with Leonard Bernstein since its inception in 1958, will join the Parsons College (Fairfield, Iowa) Fine Arts Summer faculty as Visiting Professor of Musical Production. Englander is currently serving as producer of the N. Y. Philharmonic's special spring season of concerts to be held May 29-June 23 on each Wednesday through Sunday in Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall with conductors Andre Kostelanetz, Andre Previn and Morton Gould. Englander will spend eight weeks, beginning June 23, on the Parsons campus working with other members of the Fine Arts Staff in a series of classroom lectures as well as the production of dramatic and musical productions.

Semer recently concluded an agreement with Ars Polona, the sole Polish export agency for music publications, in which it will be exclusive representative for the distribution of Polish orchestral material for the U. S., Canada and Mexico. The Polish catalogs include orchestral works by such composers as Lutoslawski, Baird, Gorecki, Baczewicz and Penderecki. Their material has recently been performed by the N. Y. Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony, the Cleveland Orchestra, the San Francisco Symphony and the Buffalo Philharmonic.

The Stephen Sondheim-Jule Styne score for "Gypsy" racked up a bigger disk play as a result of the release of the Warner Bros. pix version of the tuner than it was given credit for in last week's VARIETY story. "It's Good Enough Scores." The score picked up about 26 additional platings in albums and singles with "Everything's Coming Up Roses," "Small World" and "Let Me Entertain You" getting the top play. The score is published by Williamson-Stratford in the Chappell wing.

In his newest ditty about the "hot wire" between the White House and the Kremlin, Viennese composer Robert Stolz warns, "Caroline, Don't Touch That Telephone." The song describes a telephone conversation between Caroline, daughter of the President, and Khrushchev. Lyrics are by Kurt Pollak, a foreign newspaper correspondent in Vienna. The song has been recorded by Amadeo.

when Allan Sherman's LP folk parody on the Warner Bros. label, "My Son, The Folk Singer," became a runaway bestseller because its target was recognizable to all.

Pioneers

Music biggies concede that the success of folk music and the overload of folkniks in the field today are offshots of The Weavers' pioneering efforts 15 years ago. Although the group (Pete Seeger, Lee Hays, Ronnie Gilbert & Fred Hellerman) officially made its bow in 1948 at a hootenanny in New York's old Irving Place Hall, their march into the pop scene didn't begin until a year later when they were booked (at $50 apiece and free groceries) into Max Gordon's Village Vanguard in N.Y.'s Greenwich Village. It wasn't a first for folksinging on the saloon circuit—Richard Dyer-Bennett, Susan Reed, Burl Ives and Josh White had already made their mark on the Vanguard-Cafe Society Downtown axis—but it was a first for a blending of commercialism and folksom. The Weavers' two-weeker stretched into a six-month run and even brought in the non-folk oriented uptown crowd.

It was at the Vanguard that the group was caught by musical director Gordon Jenkins who brought them to Decca Records. Their disks (with Jenkins) took off from the start and they racked up a series of hits ("Goodnight Irene," "Tzena Tzena," "On Top of Old Smoky," "The John B. Sails," "So Long It's Been Good To Know You," and a flock of others) for a sales racket of more than 4,000,000 78 rpm records. And, as it does today, concert tours, nitery engagements, radio and tv bookings followed the disclicks.

Red Tinge

It was smooth and successful sailing for the group until they were caught up in the McCarthy investigations. The "Communist" charge (since lifted) was a tough rap to beat and by the end of 1952 the group decided to disband. Three years later, Harold Leventhal, the group's manager, brought them back for a reunion concert at Carnegie Hall. The concert was put on tape and after several companies had turned it down, Vanguard decided to issue "The Weavers At Carnegie Hall" LP and once again the group started a folksong revival. Many areas of employment have reopened to them since then but network tv continues to remain a major holdout.

For the Carnegie hash, which Leventhal is producing, six Weavers have been lined up. Pete Seeger, one of the original group who is now soloing, and Erik Darling, who replaced Seeger and then left last year to form The Rooftop Singers, will join the current members Ronnie Gilbert, Fred Hellerman, Lee Hays (of the original group) and Frank Hamilton.

The concert will be recorded by Vanguard and it's expected that it will be a disk-primer for the youthful folkniks still warming up on the wings.

Luis Fields Joins Ava

Luis Fields has been set as exclusive promotion representative for Ava Records in the Southern California territory. He'll headquarter in Ava's L.A. office and will cover radio-tv stations as well as co-ordinate promotion between the distributor and retail outlets in Southern California.

Fields' disk biz credits include stints with Record Merchandising, Kapp Records, and Record Sales, Ava's L.A. distributor.

Ray Charles Hits Capacity 24G in Two Carnegie Hall Peaks, But Show's Uneven

Rhythm & blues, country & western, pop & rock singer Ray Charles brought his troupe into Carnegie Hall Sunday (28) for two performances to capacity houses for a gross of around $24,000 with the seats scaled to a $5.50 top.

Runoff was much like the previous Charles appearance at Carnegie, with the first half of the show devoted to a band recital and the post-intermission seg featuring Charles, the Raelets and, this time, band vocalist Jean King in a brace of tunes.

Charles' great vocals, deep, bluesy piano and, this time, driving tenor sax solo to open his turn, plus the neat augmentation of the four Raelets, had the house joyfully rocking as usual. But from a standpoint of showmanship, some variety and new material is in order. Charles did do a fine rendition of "Without a Song," new to this reviewer, and no one would fault his providing the numerous hits the fans expect. But some special concert material wouldn't hurt.

Miss King, a statuesque sepia belter with a strong and true voice and most effective sense of jazz phrasing, added a touch of the wanting variety, especially in a swinging rendition of Gershwin's "But Not for Me."

While Charles still sparks the show to money's worth even in a hefty-time presentation of his hits, the opening band recital was something else. There's little reason to travel to Carnegie for a dance band rendition of "Polka Dots & Moonbeams," which, admittedly, was the low point of the concert seg.

But, as a whole, the presentation was pretentious and solemn, featuring solo work that generally lacked any distinction or excitement. Band as a unit performs with technical skill and precision, but Carnegie Hall is not Frank Dailey's Meadowbrook. Bill.

Charles' $40,486 take

Ray Charles spent a profitable weekend with dates in Newark, Hartford and Carnegie Hall, N. Y., on successive days starting Friday (26). At the Mosque, Newark, he grossed $12,469, and picked up $12,027 at the Bushnell Auditorium, Hartford. His matinee and evening shows at Carnegie Hall on Sunday resulted in an SRO $24,000 with the legal limit of standees in back.

Dates were under auspices of Mal Zeiger, who has been promoting Charles dates in various parts of the country. Zeiger picks up Charles again tonight (Wed.) with a stand in Syracuse.

Shep Fields, on 'Do-It-Himself' Orient Tour, Hits Agencies' Accent on Jazz

By DAVE JAMPEL

Tokyo, April 30.

Claiming that the major booking agencies which have penetrated this territory are only interested in sending jazz musicians, Shep Fields is here on the second step of a do-it-himself swing of Hawaii and the Far East to book his Rippling Rhythm band for a tour of U. S. military bases that will begin in September.

Already set for two weeks of dates in Hawaii, Fields expects to put together at least two weeks in Japan. He hopes for a tour of at least 10 weeks with his 11 musicians and a girl vocalist.

Fields will be pioneering as the first American name dance band to play military installations in this area. If the tour is successful, other dispensers of polite popular music are likely to follow. Fields is thus far amazed by the enthusiasm his project has evoked among the special services personnel and the club custodians he has met.

"I don't think the people the agencies have sent here are a complete representation of American music," Fields told VARIETY. "They overlook the Guy Lombardos, Freddy Martins, Russ Morgans, Wayne Kings and Lawrence Welks. And yet these are the bands that represent dance music."

Cost Frightened Agents

He explained too, that when he contacted local agents, he found them to be frightened at the cost of the band and its transportation expenses. "They wanted me to bring only a few people and fill out the band with Japanese musicians," Fields said. "But I felt that would be cheating, to give only half my band."

Six eight months ago he sent form letters directly to the clubs on U. S. military installations. He describes the response as "tremendous."

While Fields' tour is being geared to turn a profit, he said he is not going to play just those clubs that can pay the top dollar. "As much as we can," he added, "we plan on accommodating the small bases where the need is great. It's good public relations. I'm not making this tour to get rich."

The blanketing of as many bases as possible by Fields is being accomplished by selling the band for a total sum in an area and then having the individual clubs buy portions of the time. At the larger clubs, Fields will do a 45-minute show and devote the balance of four hours to playing for dancing.

In smaller situations, he will present the same self-contained show and then play for about 45 minutes, then hopping to another club for a repeat performance the same evening. When the occasion demands, the band can do two hours of concertizing.

Band's Standard Price

Fields stipulated that his price is the same throughout the territory. He and his band will be transported by a commercial airline. Asked how his price compares with the fees he receives in the U. S., Fields replied, "It is comparable in the final profits, after all expenses are paid."

One of the primary reasons for the tour, Fields explained, is to keep his music close to the servicemen. He pointed out that in the U. S., about 30% of his engagements are at military bases. And since servicemen are migratory, he believes touring the Far East and probably Europe later will cultivate fans for the future in America.

"Without the money from the military bases there would be a big hole in the band business," Fields said. "We travel eight months out of the year, mostly playing one-night stands. I can't think that could be done constantly without the bases. They take Sundays, Mondays and Tuesdays, helping us to stay on the road for the more lucrative appearances at such as country clubs and police balls. You take a look at any band's itinerary and you'll see 20% to 35% of its bookings at military bases."

Now a trim 52, Fields has performed the economy-defying feat of holding a band together for almost 30 years. Today his is one payroll. His musicians have a par-

Joe Harnell Sour Over TV Sound

Joe Harnell, who hit the disk big time last year with his Kapp recording of "Fly Me To The Moon—Bossa Nova," has a sour note for tv sound. The disk pianist, who is musical director of Goodson-Todman's "Play Your Hunch," complains that tv studios are too cramped for space to accommodate the proper audio and. It's doubtful that there will be any great improvement in the quality of tv sound in the near future.

"Most tv studios," Harnell says, "are converted radio stations or legit theatres, which long preceded stereo and weren't, of course, designed with fidelity in mind. Old legit houses are the worst. One of them is so bad from a tv point of view that some of the electronic equipment has had to be squeezed between the men's and ladies' rooms."

Harnell believes, however, that tv sound will eventually catch up with tv sight as a result of natural evolution and after the video engineers lick the color problem. Meanwhile, he says, other factors are working in favor of better tv sound. One is the eventual necessity to replace present studios with specially-designed installations, when facilities wear out. Another factor is viewer demand for better sound on their sets.

"We take hi-fi and stereo more and more for granted, via records, home recording equipment and films, which present the ultimate in both viewing and listening pleasure for minimum cost. The day could be right around the corner when viewers will demand better tv sound—or they won't buy the sets. Nothing would hasten better tv sound quicker than buyer resistance to available product."

His new Kapp album, "More Joe Harnell—More Bossa Nova," hits the market this week.

VOTE ADAMS TO 4TH TERM AS ASCAP PREZ

Stanley Adams was reelected president of the American Society of Composers, Authors & Publishers for his fourth consecutive term at the Society's Board meeting last Thursday (25).

Other officers elected were Rudolph Taubert of G. Schirmer, vice-president; Jimmy McHugh, second v.p.; Paul Creston, secretary; Jack Bregman, of BVC, treasurer; Morton Gould, assistant secretary, and Adolph Vogel of Elkan-Vogel, assistant treasurer.

Up until last year, the ASCAP presidency was limited to three years but an amendment fixed it so that the president could be reelected for an unlimited number of terms. The president's salary was set a couple of years ago at $40,000 annually. Adams, who has been on the ASCAP board of directors since 1944, is the Society's eighth president.

Replaced by last week's election were Deems Taylor who had been secretary and Ned Washington, assistant secretary.

Howard S. Richmond expresses sincere appreciation to the writers, recording artists, record companies, program directors and disc jockeys for making possible

McGuires Get 2-Way Reprise Deal, Bluesville Sets Witherspoon; Others

After an 11-year hitch with the Coral label, The McGuire Sisters will now record for Reprise Records. The dishery set a two-way deal: one is to record the girls (Phyllis, Christine and Dorothy) together, and the other is to record Phyllis solo. They'll be cutting their first LP for Reprise in New York at the end of May. Meantime, the trio has signed a representation deal with Creative Management, new firm set up by Freddie Fields and David Beigelman.

Bluesville: Jimmy Witherspoon

Jimmy Witherspoon, blues singer, has signed with Prestige Records to record for its subsid Bluesville label. Witherspoon is doing a string of one-nighters (May 3-4-5) in Elmira (N.Y.), Erie (Pa.) and Rochester (N.Y.).

D'Arcy: Bob Barron

Bob Barron has been signed to a disk deal by Lester Sill for the D'Arcy label. The first release will be "Samba International" which the singer recorded in Brazil. It will be coupled with "Ginny Come Lately."

CAP UPS ALEX BRUCE TO CUSTOM SERVICES POST

Alex Bruce has been set as manager of the Production Section of Capitol Records' Custom Services Department.

He'll direct and coordinate all Coast activities of the department, with the exception of Library Services. His responsibilities will include rental of the Hollywood recording studios and procurement of custom pressing business for both the L.A. and Scranton plants.

Bruce, who's been with Cap since 1947, was a sales rep of the Custom Services Department before the promotion.

Space-Tone '62 Profit Into Black With $86,570

Sales rackup for Space-Tone Electronics Corp. for 1962 was $2,128,335, 82% above the $1,167,-664 volume posted in '61. Net income for '62 was $86,570, equal to 26½ c per share, compared with a loss of $35,744 the previous year.

Space-Tone manufactures hi-fi stereo consoles and components. The Washington (D.C.) producer also operates the American Music Guild, a stereo record and console subscription club.

MPHC's Slate

Music Publishers Holding Corp. (the Warner Bros. Pictures' publishing arm), which came back to Broadway two seasons ago with "The Gay Life" by Howard Dietz & Arthur Schwartz, has another Dietz & Schwartz tuner, "Jennie," ready to go for next season. Also being readied by MPHC is Ervin Drake's musicalization of "What Makes Sammy Run."

This hefty legitune schedule and the large number of publishers involved have been keeping the record companies busy auditioning for original cast album properties. The field's wide open, but it's still early in the game.

However RCA Victor will do "Student Gypsy" which it had latched on to for recording this season but the production was postponed. It's also been reported that Victor has wrapped up "Jennie." The Dietz & Schwartz tuner, which is scheduled to go into rehearsal next month for a Broadway preem in October, will star Mary Martin.

LP Sales Soaring in W. Germany As EPs and Singles Take Dive

Frankfurt, April 30.

West Germany is experiencing increasing sales of 12-inch LPs, with interest going down in the smaller LPs and in the singles.

Reports just released which analyze the 1962 record business indicate that 91,200,000 titles were brought out—and of that number, the best gaining sellers were the 12-inch LPs, with sales in that category up from 4,300,000 in 1961 to 5,700,000 in 1962.

Sales of singles dropped from 32,000,000 sold in 1961 to just 30,400,000 sold in 1962. Most of the major firms had raised prices on singles in Germany during the year, but the main reason for the downward sales trend was that people would rather collect the larger LPs instead of the singles, it was noted by disk experts.

Record exports increased during 1962 to 26,100,000 titles (against 24,700,000 in 1961). Also more records from other lands were imported, with 5,400,000 as against 4,610,000 titles imported in 1961.

Interesting sidelight is that the West Germans are particularly interested in serious and classical music—sales in that category were 30,000,000 titles or about one third of the total sold. That is more than double the average 15% classical music sold in other lands of the western world.

Number of stereo platters moved up to 5% of the total sold, with 5,300,000 titles sold during the year, an increase of over 300,000 from the stereos sold in 1961.

Record clubs accounted for only 4,700,000 of the platter sales, thus dispelling fears that the clubs (which offer the disks at special extras) would hurt the regular business of the record shops.

British Biz Rises

London, April 30.

While British disk makers' business in February was 20% higher than the same month last year, exports dived 3% according to figures just released by the Board of Trade. Total sales were $4,-22,000, with domestic biz at $3,-000,000 or 20% higher than the corresponding month in '62. Exports for this February were $682,-000.

The number of disks produced in February (6,091,000) was 15% more than the previous February with 45 rpm's (4,714,000) up around 30% and albums (2,132,-000) up 12%.

Most of the resistance is coming from kindergarden teachers, Miss Lewis admits. However, she can understand their problem. "Most of them," she explains, "are not equipped to apply jazz touches to their musical curriculum and have to continue to rely on the established old English patterns.

On a higher educational level, though, Miss Lewis does get encouragement for her jazz showcasings. College and university professors, she says, have told her that her musical program is current and that this exposure to jazz is good for children.

Miss Lewis now plans to extend her efforts to the theatre. Upcoming are plans for a kiddie show, along the lines of her tv productions, at a Broadway theatre next Christmas. The legiter will be produced by Bill Foster, who takes over the production of her tv show in June.

Rome, April 30.

Rita Pavone awarded RCA Gold Disk for her millionth record at Rome ceremony. She achieved remarkable total in only three months, now has first LP coming out, is slated for summer nitery tour followed by French appearances and a U.S. recording date. Hermanos Rigual, whose "Cuando Calienta el Sol" sold over 400,000 here to date—also for RCA—present at award festivities held at manager Teddy Reno's Ariccia establishment. Gold platter for the 18-year-old Miss Pavone follows two others awarded by RCA here, both going to singer Nico Fidenco.

Connie Francis in for 48 hours in between S. Africa-to-U.S. hops to tape a special for RAI-TV. Metro party also offered lead in Italian-based pic . . . Renato Rascel is issuing a pleasant platter geared to the local political election campaign. It's called "The Happy Years will Continue" and is pic-k ted with a good ballad lead by its guitarist-composer, Armando Romeo.

George Gershwin music has inspired two new video ballets by Ugo Dell'Ara, which RAI-TV will schedule late this month. Items are based on "Concerto in Fa," "Cuban Overture," and "Rhapsody in Blue" . . . The 1963 "Cantagiro"—a song tour of Italian resorts and centers organized by Ezio Radaelli—gets under way June 22, ending July 3 at Fiuggi. Adriano Celentano was last year's winner. Public votes for each days' winner in contest which has uncovered several new names in booming local musical field.

Bestseller in CAM's recent collection of film music is the "8½" LP, spurred by success of Federico Fellini pic for which Nino Rota penned the music. Score from Fellini's previous "Dolce Vita"—also by Rota—is still all-time top seller among local LP's based on pix, in an RCA recording. Still in the pic orbit, CAM will soon release an LP and two 45's featuring Sophia Loren's readings (under direction of Vittorio DeSica) of a number of Neapolitan poems by Salvatore di Giacomo.

of the few bands with a permanent anteed salary 48 weeks a year. Six of his 11 men, including drummer-arranger Freddie Noble, are of pre-war Rippling Rhythm vintage.

Based in Houston

Using Houston Shamrock Hilton Hotel as his base for the last eight years, Fields heads the Artists Corp. of Texas for booking his own band, several combos and most of the big convention activity there. Fields noted that he is booked solidly through Labor Day, with engagements at the Claremont Hotel in Berkeley, Cal., the Holiday Hotel lounge in Reno (his first lounge date) and the summer at the Shamrock.

Based on the upsurge of interest in the last four years, Fields detects a renaissance in the band biz. He feels those dancers lost during the postwar years now have enough security—with their children raised, their homes paid for and their incomes sufficient—to permit them to dance at a country club or hotel ballroom.

At the same time, he finds his band attracting youngsters, some of whom are hearing the standard numbers for the first time. At a test four-day tour of U. S. military bases in Puerto Rico in January, Fields played mostly enlisted men's clubs. He's returning there next month for eight days—at an increased price.

Congratulations to THE WEAVERS

15th Anniversary

THE WEAVERS and Alumni at rehearsal for the May 2 and May 3 Carnegie Hall 15th Anniversary Concerts.

ON this occasion of your Fifteenth Anniversary, all of us who have worked closely with you through the years, congratulate you for the great contribution you have made to the musical culture of America.

WE are particularly proud of each of your founding members—RONNIE GILBERT, LEE HAYS, FRED HELLERMAN and PETE SEEGER—for singing those songs out of the finest traditions of our country. You have given meaning and purpose, and an awareness, to what folk music means to Americans today. Your musicality has been matched by your integrity.

THE songs that you first introduced, "Goodnight Irene", "Tzena, Tzena", "Michael Row The Boat Ashore", "On Top of Old Smokey", "So Long, It's Been Good To Know You", and so many others, have become the repertoire and hits of today's folk music groups. Your talents as creators and writers of the songs, "Lonesome Traveller", "Kisses Sweeter Than Wine", "The Hammer Song" and "Where Have All The Flowers Gone" have added to the well of folk material to be drawn upon for many years to come.

YOU have inspired the youth of America by opening up the vast reservoir of folk material from the confines of the researchers and have given this wonderful music the widest audience it has ever enjoyed.

AS The Weavers continued on with ERIK DARLING (who replaced Pete in 1958) and FRANK HAMILTON who took Erik's spot in 1962, we now greet the younger new Weaver, BERNIE KRAUSE, who next month joins LEE HAYS, FRED HELLERMAN and RONNIE GILBERT to carry on what has now become a tradition—as THE WEAVERS enter their sixteenth year!

THIS LAND IS YOUR LAND

BY

WOODY GUTHRIE

This land is your land, this land is my land,
From California to the New York island,
From the redwood forest to the Gulf Stream water,
This land was made for you and me.

As I went walking that ribbon of highway,
I saw above me that endless skyway,
I saw below me that golden valley,
This land was made for you and me.

I roamed and I rambled and I followed my footsteps
To the sparkling sands of her diamond deserts,
While all around me a voice was sounding,
Saying, "This land was made for you and me."

The sun came shining and I was strolling,
And the wheat fields waving and the dust clouds rolling,
As the fog was lifting, a voice was chanting,
"This land was made for you and me."

Savoy Hilton, N.Y.

Chauncey Grey Orch (7), Arturo Arturos 3; Ray Hartley; $2 and $3 cover.

The late Ted Straeter was just beginning to turn the tide with the straight danceation policy at the Savoy Hilton's class main room, The Columns, and in fact the management is strongly of the opinion that, newspaper blackout or not, had he not had that Palm Beach commitment last January, the bill would have clicked. The popular "society music" maestro, with his strong personal following, took off annually to Florida where he underwent that fatal operation.

The room has another society fave in Chauncey Grey following the Paysan Re Orch and, preceding Straeter, Gunnar Hansen, with his svelte violinizing. Latter is currently at the Sheraton East's Embassy Club and, like Peter Duchin at the St. Regis' Maisonette, likewise has strong personal following.

By and large, however, the idea of "reviving" straight dance music as a real class draw has been hit-and-miss, save for seasonal spurts. The click of Le Club (actually a discotheque) and now L'[illegible], another "closed membership" club in the basement of the Hotel Gotham, is due more to the snob appeal. With an open-door policy, be it The Columns, the [illegible], or any other class hotel room, perhaps something stronger is needed.

This becomes the chicken-and-the-egg headache for those hotels which seem to have decided not to buck the Persian Room, the Royal Box or the Empire Room of the Waldorf. (In fact even the onetime New York Hilton is leaning the "name" policy to its Park Ave. affiliate, the Waldorf).

Surprisingly, on a late Friday, The Columns had a fair turnout and maitre d'hotel John Salvo was starting to beam because the well-dressed clientele seemed genuinely fond of the tempos of both Grey and the singy Arturos Trio. Ray Hartley spells both, with pre-theatre dinner entr'acte music when not in the adjoining Cafe Lounge, which new managing director Dean Carpenter renamed to its traditionally renowned tag, after being billed as the Savoy Bar for some four years.

The Columns plans staying open all summer, with an eye to the tourist influx, which is true of the other hotels in the past two years, and perhaps might return to a "moderate" presentation policy when the World's Fair crush starts. The latter thought is well worth scouting even as of next fall.

Abel.

Statler Hotel, L.A.

Los Angeles, April 10.

"The Beautiful Americans" More-Landis revue; Dick Patterson, Peggy Womack, Wayne Albritton, Vicki Carroll, Susan Wedell, Vicki Sue Johns, Alison Nelson, Jacque Childers, Roberta Lowe, Gail Mead, Grace Metzer, Nena Wilson; Skinny Ennis Orch (9); $2 cover.

This second George More-Ruth Landis revue to be Terrace-d in L.A. is a cut better than its predecessor. Like the first it hews to the same format which has proved so successful in this convention-center caravansary. In brief, emphasis is on La Belle.

Burdened with the utterly unimaginative and unwieldy title of "The Beautiful Americans," theme for the successive waves of production numbers is brassy pageants from the time the gals were billowy, bloomered swimsuits to the bikinis of This Year of Grace. Best production romp is a flapper-era frolic with the line leggers unlimbering some sexy Charlestoning.

Top billed, Dick Patterson is a personable comic who also can hoof and howl. He opened with some excellent, topical one-liners and stirred the risibles with some deft twitting of L.A.'s follies, and with barbed commentary on tv blurbs. His satirical shafts at "Ben Casey" and a Nazi medico sank deep.

Peggy Womack did some arm-widening acro dancing, and Wayne Albritton leads the line lassies through their paces. As always in these shows the gals are the salvationers, and this group is a pretty and perky as the Statler has fleered over the years.

More staged with imagination and his wife Ruth Landis created novel costumes. Her brother, tv producer Joe Landis, contributed some special material and Virginia Johnson's settings are tasteful. Musical arrangements, rather standard, are by Richard Hieronymous and Bud Estes.

Skinny Ennis' nine-piece orch, as always, plays an excellent show and Ennis additionally has a book and dance-beat that fits the clientele here between the twice-nightly shows.

For $5,000 this packaged revue is a whale of a buy. More-Landis obviously couldn't do it, save that this booking is a firm three months and the production combine also is able to amortize because it provides production routines for Las Vegas and other area niteries.

Wes.

Hotel Roosevelt, N.O.

New Orleans, April 25.

Jan Murray, Michi Marie, Leon Kelner Orch (11); $2.50 weeknight minimum; $4 Sats.

New layout in Seymour Weiss' plush Blue Room ought to shower in dividends for the next two weeks. It's a good, clean and refreshing show topped by comic Jan Murray, with great thrush Michi Marie for the [illegible].

With a quick wit and relaxed style, Murray socks across a polished routine that builds easily. He demonstrates that he's a pennant winner in the standup comedy league with clever material, plus fresh twists and punchlines deftly timed.

Murray could do no wrong opening night; tablesitters hauled him back for more after he had worked for more than 40 minutes. One thing stood out at his opening show. He avoided smut and blue jokes.

Miss Marie, who has appeared with Murray on his tv stints, tees off the show. The dark-haired warbler warms her songs with a friendly smile, clicks handily with such numbers as "Everybody Loves A Lover."

Maestro Leon Kelner, [illegible] [illegible] for Murray, and his musical crew give acts topflight backing throughout and keep the floor packed during the dance sessions. Kelner intros acts capably, too.

Show runs until May 8. Liuz.

Hawaiian Room, N.Y.

"South Pacific Aloha," produced and directed by Tony Cabot; with Keola Beamer, Mona Joy, Prince Paalia, Jeana, Mapela, Kekoa, Denny Roger; Ted Auletta Orch, Sam Makia Trio; $2 cover.

There's not much difference between this show and the one which was launched here late in 1960 except the title and some fresh faces and dancers. The management wisely has decided to ride with a winner, and not tamper with a successful format.

New production has an up-to-date touch via having the swivel-hipped dancers try their hand with the bossa nova, the cha-cha and the twist. It's rather revealing how little these pop dances differ from the hula.

Present show (room is operated by Restaurant Associates, which also has the Forum, Four Seasons and other chi-chi eateries under its wing) plays strongly. Tony Cabot, who staged and directed, is a youthful vet of three seasons or more at this Hotel Lexington room. Keola Beamer, credited with staging all dances, leads off the boom nova and kindred dance numbers with fine assists from three Hawaiian terpers.

Jeana is standout in a Tahitian number. Her dance is an exciting improvement of the familiar Turkish delight. A new added feature is Prince Paalia, a wild sword dancer, who handles the blades as though they were batons.

Mona Joy is an attractive femme singer who scores best with "Ebb-tide." Cabot also does several vocals and keeps the show rolling smoothly with his glib emceeing.

Denny Roger a holdover from several previous shows, makes his ukulele sound as smooth as a cello. Impressive specialty is the madcap dancing of Oima to "Deep Purple" music. Finale is termed a Hawaiian Square Dance, giving four members of the audience a chance to participate. Strictly for laughs.

Ted Auletta's Orch plays a solid show, and for some patron terping. Sam Makia's Trio handles the music for other customer dancing. Both outfits are holdovers from many shows. Wear.

Hotel Astor, N.Y.

Floyd Ackerman presentation of "Broadway Scrapbook" with Jeanne Beretta, David Chaney, Jolora Fedor, Ken Kercheval, Barbara London. Staged by Rocco Bufano; musical director, Gene Casey; conductor-pianist, Bob Mitrani; special material, Rod Warren & Gene Casey; $5.00 minimum.

The Hotel Astor apparently likes the intimate revue, having installed its second this season with the opening of "Broadway Scrapbook" which has a quintet of likeable performers. This revue is somewhat different than any of the others in town. It consists of some of the top moments of Broadway musicals, grouping memorable tunes of the best remembered layouts on the Stem. It's an entertaining two-seater.

The revue here is on safe grounds. The material has had public acceptance, and the unfamiliar items, such as contained in some of the new musicals, provides fresh inserts. It gives a knowledgeable cast an opportunity to display their talents within easy reach of Broadway producers.

It's difficult to select any standouts in this show. There is an unfortunate uniformity of presentation, albeit on an extremely high level. The revue, however, is an extra-polished layout, providing enjoyment all the way. It will be an excellent divertissement for the Astor's Emerald Room.

The performers participating are Jeanne Beretta, David Chaney, Jolora Fedor, Ken Kercheval and Barbara London. The girls are diverse physical types, all of whom seem personable and know their way around a song. The lads stand up well and provide an occasional bit of gusto.

But the music seems to be the star of the show. The tunes are the top remembered moments of the great musicals. The score is the core of the show. It's animated, lively, sentimental at times and there are moments of humor.

Producer Floyd Ackerman has assembled this layout tastefully. He has arranged the layout so that there is a relation of songs within a group. There is an effort into grouping of numbers to bring the entire show off as a pleasing unison. Bob Mitrani conducts the trio providing the backing. Jose.

Cork Club, Houston

Houston, April 25.

Gogi Grant, Tommy Noonan, More-Landis Dancers (10), Mel Arvin Orch (11); $2.50 cover.

Miss Grant was never more attractive, nor have her pipes shown to better advantage, in unveiling of her new nitery act at Glenn McCarthy's Cork Club. Also, plaudits are due for Sid Miller, who wrote her special material, and Al Pellegrini, her musical conductor who did arrangements.

Best work of both is evident in thrush's special material near closing, a historical medley covering femmes from Eve to Jackie—it can be said that Eve was covered—and arrangement of "Melancholy Baby" with singing intro.

Miss Grant opens with special material, then does a five-minute medley featuring "Night and Day." Other tunes are "I've Got Your Number," "Little Hollywood Star," her w.k. arrangement of "Wayward Wind," "What Kind of Fool Am I?" and "Make Someone Happy." Show is timed at 35 minutes.

Tommy Noonan is a likeable comic who can sell himself to patrons, but he could use new material. His stories, mostly familiar, cover the Irish in general, priests, wakes and family life. His tv cooking school routine, with chef mangling various liquors, is similar to Red Skelton's famous gag; at times it's very funny. Comic manages to sustain chuckles fairly consistently. He's on stage for 25 minutes.

More-Landis dancers, in one of better routines, are on for five minutes. Mel Arvin Orch, which never cuts bad show, is particularly good in this one.

Show plays two frames. Skip.

Hampton House, K.C.

Kansas City, April 23.

Peggy DeCastro & Trio; $1 cover Fri. - Sat., no cover weekdays.

One of the plush little spots that has joined the burgeoning colony of cocktail lounges on the Broadway midtown strip, the Hampton House has been open a little over a year. Recently it launched a policy of booking better names, such as a recent fortnight with Bob Anna, and now this 12-night stand by Peggy DeCastro.

She is known here from previous stand downtown at Eddys' Restaurant, but has since changed her setup to include piano and drums as regular part of her retinue. String bass is added here, and the trio plays for dancing between shows.

Singer works out a long list of songs in 35 minutes, going from her cork hit, "Touch Me Tonight," to hit parade toppers and several established items. Her throaty style best fits ballads like "He's My Kind of Guy" and "That's the Glory of Love," yet she does okay by "I Left My Heart in San Francisco" and turns out a heated mid-way medley of rhythm tunes. Miss DeCastro turns to a Latino tune for her finale, and into a specialty session by the trio winds the show.

Russell D'Anna, the HH boniface, reports biz is helped by the acts and policy is likely to continue. Quin.

Sabbra, N.Y.

Lee Fuld, Yael Sharr, Esther Tahbi, Menashe Baharav, Sabbra Dancers (4), Bob Phillips Orch; $3.50 minimum.

Lee Fuld, since opening his Sabbra six years ago, has made approximately as many trips to Israel to come up with a lot of new talent which has brightened the nitery horizon. Many of his Israeli finds have gone on to other fields. Fuld seemingly has reached the epitome of success for a talent discoverer by not being able to afford many of the performers to whom he gave a start.

This Israeli cafe has a show which differs from many of its nocturnal contemporaries. It's a display that attempts to depict the simplicity to be found in a growing country. There's a vigor and homeliness in the current session, and even a touch of Americanese with Yael Sharr (New Acts).

There's a line comprising three couples who provide simple and spirited dancing. The choreography is not normal for the nitery orbit. It's patterned after group numbers of collective farms, and is extremely colorful.

The cafe is repeating Esther Tahbi, who made her bow here last season. She's a dark complexioned singer who provides moments of excitement. Most of her tunes are in Hebrew, rendered in a sultry manner with incidental dancing to point up their values. She gets along here nicely.

Other major performer is Menashe Baharav, singer-mime and composer, who delves into multilingual tunes to provide a musical pot character to his act. He's a vet along the circuit, and his singing is merely an incidental to his other attributes. He plays a skilled accordion and hits it well on the clarinet.

The musical backing is by Bob Phillips Orch. Boniface Fuld paces the show with emceeing and warms up the crowd with a few stories. Former Israeli dancer Jacques Hepper is the maitre. Jose.

Skyroom, Tucson

Tucson, Ariz., April 25.

Three Young Men from Montana, Lou Garno Quartet; no cover, no minimum.

Although billed as folksingers, the Three Young Men from Montana spend the current cruise with their lusty vocals, minus the traditional folk music prop, the guitar. The threesome, who were fraternity brothers at Montana State U., also stray from the folk norm and remain seated throughout the performance, two on stools and the other behind the piano.

Trio comprises is Bob Busby, Dick Riddle and Pat Fox. It's the first booking in the Skyroom atop the Arizona Land Title Bldg. since manager Art Leonard, lately of the Playboy Club in Phoenix, took over the reins. The Young Men, with strong harmony piping, took throughout through a variety of tempi on the likes of "Unsinkable Molly Brown," "Sak Stockings," "Satin and Silk" and "Savanna" and were brought back for encores.

The Lou Garno Quartet, fresh from the Playboy in Phoenix, provides solid music for terping and some lively instrumentals, featuring Garno's fine flute work on jazz and Latin numbers, and the piano of Russ Phillips.

The Three Young Men, originally booked for one week, are held over through May 4. Alex.

Shoreham, D.C.

Washington, April 24.

Gordon & Sheila MacRae, Bob Cross Orch (10), Steve Kisley Orch (7); $2.50 cover.

Gordon & Sheila MacRae filled every table in the vast Shoreham Hotel Blue Room for their opening, an achievement seldom matched in a place of such size except on weekends. They are a strong draw in this area, which they proved in a Blue Room fortnight last year.

Their present outing, with a completely different show, coincides with the height of the spring tourist season here. With all the hoopla about the cherry trees, it has reached the point where Washington draws more sightseers in the spring than in the summer.

The MacRaes still rely upon impersonations for the major part of their performance. They are mimicking some new people this round, including the Kennedys. Some of their better takeoffs of former years, like Carol Channing, Edward R. Murrow, etc., are retained but have been rewritten and restaged.

Mrs. MacRae's spoof of Jacqueline Kennedy conducting a White House tour is the most authentic Jackie of any previously seen here, either in clubs or on the tv tube. Her voice, mannerisms and dress are just right. The bit is the hit of the show, even though Gordon MacRae's impresh of the President misses the mark.

MacRae is considerably better as Dean Martin and Red Skelton, among others. One routine has him as Louis Prima with Sheila MacRae as Liz Taylor in a Cleopatra costume more revealing than anything which will ever be seen in the film. To keep it clean, Mrs. MacRae wears a rhinestoned body shield under the immense dive of the Cleopatra neckline.

MacRae is in fine voice with his "Oklahoma!" and "Carousel" familiars, plus a medley under the title of "A Salute to Everyone in Love." Sheila MacRae has a dazzling wardrobe for the show, with about 10 costume changes involved.

The Bob Cross orchestra is a top quality outfit for supporting such an act. Steve Kisley's orch alternates with a potpourri of rhythms. Corp.

Tidelands, Houston

Houston, April 23.

Davis & Reese, Don Goldie Orch (4); $1.50 entertainment charge.

Comic Pepper Davis looks like he has discovered the secret of perpetual motion, which adds suspense to good comedy turn, for patrons wait for him to drop. Tony Reese has good set of pipes, but doesn't use 'em much, and most of skits are well tried and true.

Davis still does the punchy prizefighter he did in last appearance here 18 months ago, and does the work of a male dancing line for the Hollywood starlet played by Reese. Also in act are his impressions with the mike stand, most of which are funny bits. In addition, team tears apart some tv commercials. Pair performs well on tandem drums, ends up with terping duet atop the bottles. Goldie Orch also performs well. Show plays two frames. Skip.

Gatineau, Ottawa

Ottawa, April 26.

Johnny Pulee & His Harmonica Gang (4), Barbara Brian, Cal Bostic, Russ Thomas Orch (5); $2.50 admission.

Johnny Pulee and his harmonica-comedy group are bringing capacity business to the new Gatineau Club. The music-panto stint is in top form and garners solid mitting throughout. Pulee and gang have had big tv exposure here via a skein of commercials they filmed for a brewery last time around.

For this session, boniface Joe Nunn switched the new club's main room around, locating the stage and house band in a new spot that gives customers better and closer view. Thursday's (25) opener found everybody happy with the format and the show. Besides the boisterous, zany Pulee tooters and bashers, the session includes whistle-making chirper Barbara Brian (New Acts), embarking on what could well be a standout career, and Cal Bostic, (New Acts) brought into the show from his 88-and-chant chores in the Gatineau's Blue Lounge.

Backing the layout and playing for customers' terping is the house band, Russ Thomas orchestra, in its usual cliche performance.

Show is in to May 1. Gorm.

Pitt Civic Arena Drops Ringling Show, Books Moscow State Circus for Nov.

Pittsburgh, April 30.

The Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus will have to pass up Pittsburgh this year as there is no room at the Civic Arena for both it and the Moscow State Circus, which is tentatively scheduled for November.

Bill Torre, press rep for John H. Harris Associates which will present the Soviet circus when it plays Pitt, said that Harris already had decided not to play the Ringling show because of its soft biz last year. When Harris turned down Ringling this year, he informed the Arena executive director, Ed Fraher, that he was going to hold the dates for the Moscow circus.

Irvin Feld, who promotes for Ringling in many cities, then came in to seek other dates. But Fraher, who has resigned from his post effective May 1, told him the building didn't have room for another circus.

In another day, the Big Show would have met the competition in stride by taking a lot on the other side of the city. But there are no more lots and Ringling no longer has canvas so it has to depend on rustling dates in the arenas of the country.

The Shrine circus is currently in the Arena and Tom Packs with present his Police Circus in Forbes Field this summer. Fraher has always felt that two circuses in Pitt were enough for a year.

Torre said that he didn't think any circus could compete with the Russian circus because of its world wide reputation and of the intense ballyhoo that will accompany its tour of the U.S.

Moscow State Circus Set For 2-Week Vancouver Stand; Potential Biz 310G

Vancouver, April 30.

The Moscow State Circus is coming to town next Christmas but will trail Santa Claus by several hours. The 70-man Russian troupe will open a two-week stand in Vancouver Dec. 25 under joint sponsorship of the Vancouver International Festival and the Pacific National Exhibition. The circus plays Winnipeg, Calgary and Edmonton on the Canadian leg of its North American tour before coming here.

The circus will be staged in the PNE's new Livestock Bldg. Top admission price will be around $4.50 compared to tops in eastern Canadian and U.S. cities ranging from $5.50 to $10. Gross potential for the stand is $310,000.

Directors of the VIF and PNE have been told that gross expenses will total $162,525, which includes a $50,000 minimum guarantee for the circus. Some 65% of gross receipts will go to the circus company, with the local groups splitting 56-50 on the remaining 35%.

The Red Army Chorus appeared in Vancouver in 1961 under sole sponsorship of the VIF and played to sellout audiences in its four performances.

KINGSVILLE, TEX., COPS JUMP PHONY 'CHUBBY'

Kingsville, Tex., April 30.

A spurious Chubby Checker was given his walking papers out of this city following a one-night stand here last week at the Knights of Columbus Hall. The local chief of police, J. M. Compton, questioned the performer and despite his knowledge of Checker's history, such as saying his real name is Ernest Evans and his permanent residence is Philadelphia, further checks were made.

Chief Compton called the New York office of General Artists Corp., which agents Checker, and also the Sands Hotel, Las Vegas, where Checker is currently appearing. Compton enumerated the promoter, Algy Webb, who stated that he booked "Checker" in good faith. The phony Checker identified himself as Steve Ross of Shreveport, La., who was traveling with the Little Melvin (Underwood) band, also of Shreveport.

Benny's Bridgeport Date

Bridgeport, April 30.

Jack Benny has okayed a p.a. at the 1963 Barnum Festival "Ballyhoo" show, the variety of Bridgeport's annual spree in honor of P. T. Barnum, on June 28 at Mayboston Memorial Field.

Tickets at $5 top already being sold.

Melbourne's Lone Vaude, Tivoli, To Face Wreckers

Melbourne, April 30.

Demolition may be the fate of Melbourne's only vaude theatre, the Tivoli, which opened in May, 1891, with Marie Lloyd topping the bill. The one-acre site on which the Tiv stands along with other buildings, including a film house—in the heart of the city—has been put up for sale by Tivoli Freeholds Pty. Ltd.

Melbourne City Council took an option on the site and was offered it for $2,282,280, but after a stormy council meeting the proposal to purchase it was rejected. Had the council acquired the site it's almost certain it would have agreed to the Tiv's request for an 11-year lease.

An English company is now said to be interested in buying the site for $2,512,560, but the Tivoli building is almost certainly to be demolished and hardly likely to on the same site for over a 100 be replaced.

A variety music hall has stood years, originally called Varieties Music Hall (when miners from Ballarat showed appreciation by throwing gold nuggets on stage) and in turn has been called the Alhambra, Prince of Wales Opera House, New Opera House and since 1914 the Tivoli.

Paradoxically, it's now enjoying its greatest success with "The Black & White Minstrel Show" which opened early last October and continues till May 11. This will be succeeded by a revival of "Show Boat."

Steve Allen & Co. Set For 3-City Northwest Concert Tour in June

Hollywood, April 30.

Steve Allen has been booked for June 1-2 concert appearances at Opera House in Seattle by Northwest Releasing, headed by Jack J. Engerman and Zollie M. Volchok.

Show, which will also play Portland, Ore., and Vancouver, B. C., under Northwest banner, will feature Allen's television show performers, vocalist Jennie Smith and pianist Don Trenner, as well as a 12-minute skit of Allen talking with himself by using a kine of the teleshow.

Seattle booking, part of the "Summer at the Center Festival," gives Allen $22,000 capacity, of which he has a percentage.

Other shows booked are Tallulah Bankhead in "Here Today," June 21-25; Andy Williams Show, with New Christy Minstrels and Henry Mancini, July 8-13; Harry Belafonte, July 29-Aug. 3; "Camelot," Aug. 12-31, and Folk Festival with Peter, Paul & Mary, Odetta and Bud Travis, Aug. 11.

David Jr.'s Scot Stint

Glasgow, April 30.

Sammy Davis Jr. is pacted for two shows at the city-center Odeon Theatre here May 15, following his current five-weeks' stint at the London Palladium.

Appearing with him will be comedian Pat Henry. In the lineup with Davis will be his musical director George Rhodes, drummer Michael Silva, trumpeter Reynould Jones, guitarist Terry Rosen and bongo player Johnny Mendoza, who will augment a full stage orchestra.

FRANCOIS SZONY and NANCY CLAIRE

Currently appearing at Radio City Music Hall, New York.
Thank you Mr. Leonidoff.

JTM Execs Buy Out Holdings Of Backer Uhlmann

UTM Artists Ltd., one of the larger indies formed as a result of the folds of MCA's talent agency last July, has undergone a shakeup with the result that the company's active members have bought out the interest of its principal backer, James Uhlmann, a Coast realty man who invested in the business at the very beginning.

With the buyout, Uhlmann resigned from the UTM board, where he served as chairman. The board has now been enlarged from four to seven.

New chairman is Edwin Greene, who is also president. Other original members are A. Gerald Perenchio, B. Richard Rubin and Robert Burns. New directors are E. O. Stacey, head of the Chicago office; Jim Murray, Las Vegas branch topper, and Noel Rubiloff, of the Beverhills office. All are veepees in the firm.

The majority of UTM personnel is from the old MCA office. The outfit had hard sledding at the start, as did most of the offshoots from MCA. However, business has perked up of late which permitted the present group to buy out Uhlmann. No price was disclosed.

Chi's New Folk Nitery

Chicago, April 30.

An unusual multi-room folk nitery opens tomorrow night (Wed.) in the building that housed the L'Aiglon restaurant until that haute cuisinery went dark a few months ago. The new club is called The Bear, and its owners are Howard Alk, John Brent and Walter O'Reilly.

Opening bill has Bessie Griffin & the Gospel Pearls in one room, jazz pianist Fred Kaz in another and folksinger in the third room.

Baldwin-Montrose's 853G Net Profit But Its GAC Subsidiary in the Red

Waikiki Cafe Proem

Honolulu, April 30.

Chapman's New Frontier restaurant-bar will be Waikiki's newest talent outlet. Longtime bar is being remodeled for formal opening tomorrow (Wed.).

Initial headliner is Len Ryder, singer-guitarist from Vancouver. Larry Garrett is manager of the operation.

'Unrealistic' Fees Hit Can. Concerts Promoter Claims

Winnipeg, April 30.

Celebrity Concerts president Bill Gee, in announcing his 1963-4 season, indicated here that many names are losing playdates by quoting unrealistic fees. Increasing costs, he said, are generally lowering the profit margin in the concert and promotional fields.

Cited as an example was Harry Belafonte, who recently asked for a guarantee of $30,000 against 60%, a 24-piece orchestra, 18 stagehands and special lighting, costs to be assumed by the local promoter. Current exchange rate doesn't help the Canadian promoter either.

Gee charged that "millionaire show people insist that local management be on the hook for huge guarantees, with no financial assistance forthcoming from either artist or agent in the event of a loss being incurred."

Further, he said, "many managers feel as I do—that if the artist will not accept a more reasonable proposition, consisting of local promotion and ticket sales in return for a small percentage, then his confidence is sorely lacking in his ability to achieve a decent gross."

Climbing costs have caused concert managers to diversify their activities into related fields. Celebrity Concerts' biggest continuous boxoffice is a season of eight filmed travelogs. A wholly-owned subsidiary, World Adventure Tours, books films during winter months in Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Saskatoon, Regina and Winnipeg. Pre-season ticket sales account for 75% of the gross, with profit margins at a maximum.

Celebrity's '63-64 Series

Attractions for the 1963-64 Celebrity Concerts series in Jubilee Auditorium will be:

Yehudi Menuhin, violinist; Van Cliburn, pianist; Teresa Stratas, Met Opera soprano; Mazowsze Company, Polish singers, dancers and orchestra; Vienna Boys' Choir; The Cleboneff Strings; Cesare Seipi, Met Opera basso.

Also in the series will be the Black Watch regimental band, pipes and dancers, to be seen in the Stampede Corral.

Baldwin-Montrose Chemical Co. Inc., parent company of General Artists Corp., reported a $853,643 profit for 1962. Annual statement to stockholders also declared that GAC sales in the first quarter of 1963 were 21% ahead of the similar period of last year but it admits an overall carryover operation of 1962 GAC loss.

Only a small portion of the report is devoted to GAC. Bulk of its space is given other subsidiary companies which comprise Baldwin Rubber, Montrose Chemical and Mono-Sol Division. GAC is listed as an affiliated company along with Montrose Chemical of California and Montrose Mexicana S.A.

Report explained that the GAC expansion started last year with the demise of MCA in July 1962 when GAC decided to take advantage of the development. Cost of this expansion was partially offset by the 21% gain noted for the early part of the year, report stated.

However, it listed $2,005,154 as one of the intangible assets of GAC representing the excess of cost of investments in subsidiaries over net assets at date of acquisition, and which is not being amortized. Montrose indicates this includes $1,654,894 representing the cost over underlying book value of the common stock which was purchased as of Oct. 13, 1960 for cash of $999,747 and a maximum of 96,250 shares of common stock recorded at $10 per share, or $962,500.

As of Dec. 31, 1962, 73,250 shares are being withheld by the company pending the final determination of the income tax liabilities of GAC or the expiration of a period specified in the acquisition agreement.

It stated that the acquisitions of the talent agencies were made in an anticipation that there would be a development period during which their operations would be run at a loss, or less than projected

Cincy's Coney Previews 77th Season; Phyllis Diller, Lotsa Name Bands Set

Cincinnati, April 30.

Preview opening of Coney Island's 77th season, held over the weekend, unveiled the Calypso, its newest ride, a German importation which was a standout at the Seattle World's Fair, and gave a Las Vegas night glow to the mall with a 3,500 bulb light atop the Shooting Star. Regular season opens May 18.

Dancing in the park's Moonlite Gardens had Sammy Leeds local band for the opener. Expected hit of the dance booking this season is inclusion of comedienne Phyllis Diller for four nights, June 27-30, featured with the Buddy Roger Cincy combo. She will make two 20-minute appearances on stage, and longer if encouraged, said Gary Wachs, Coney's assistant manager.

Road bands carded for weekends are the Four Saints, June 27-30 and Aug. 29-Sept. 1; Glenn Miller, June 20-22; Four Freshmen, with Frankie Brown, July 11-14; Stan Kenton, July 18-21; Ralph Marterie, Aug. 8-11; Si Zentner Aug. 22-25, and Burt Farber, Aug 29-Sept. 1.

Local bands will be Jimmy James with singer Bob Braun of WLW and WLW-TV, Mel Gillispie.

Fold of Chi's Silver Frolics Recalls Its Key Role in Prohibition's Gang Era

Chicago, April 30.

The Silver Frolics, the last of the big barn-like niteries that dominated Chi night life in the '30s and early '40s and a strippery since the end of World War II, folded recently because of non-payment of two months' rent.

A departing manager blamed the rent default on the IRS crackdown, but an attorney representing the owner said that the lease, which would have expired July 31, would not have been renewed. The lawyer said his clients believe "the area calls for something on a higher level culturally than what this place has given the public since Prohibition."

What it did provide over the years would probably be categorized by cafe regulars as "action." It was one of the biggest of the near north side speakeasies in the Volstead Act era and is said to have been one of the main spots in contention between the two gangs that led to the St. Valentine's Day slaughter of seven rumrunners.

In the '30's, it became Harry's New Yorker, a long bar with a widely-known "secret" room that housed blackjack tables. During World War II it became the Rio Cabana, one the city's biggest clubs, and it was there that Dean Martin made his major nitery debut as a singer before doubling with Jerry Lewis.

The "secret" room was enlarged to include crap tables and chemin-de-fer. Untouched by the local gendarmerie, it was padlocked by the Feds for various violations of wartime price violations.

It reopened as the Silver Frolics after the war, and became a conventioneer draw as a reputable pool palace with a solid production format. In recent years it had become a run-of-the-mill bump and grind house.

FRENCH CT. DISMISSES MAXIM'S 'PIRACY' SUIT

Paris, April 30.

The celebrated Maxim's restaurant of Paris has lost its infringement suit against Maxim's of Nice, a cabaret, over use of the Maxim's name. Court ruled that the Riviera Maxim's was over 40 years old and the suit was a "little late."

Paris Maxim's filed the action as a test case since many restaurants and niteries are using the monicker and this practice is interfering with some proposals to form Maxim's in other countries, namely in Puerto Rico. Maxim's here feels its deals will come to naught if anybody can capitalize on the name it has made world famous. It has lost the first round

U.S. Press Junketeers' Double Feature Hilton London & Athens Premieres

By CHARLES LAZARUS

Athens, April 30.

The VIPress junket, inaugurated in a day when the Hollywood promotion rumrunner was in its heyday, is still going strong as far as the Hilton Hotels chain is concerned. And why not?

Now that the partying and plugging are over for the new Hilton hostelries opened in London (17) and Athens (21), it is fair to evaluate the results in terms of long-range profit in the immediate months ahead and into the future—far enough, in any case, to organize these gratis feed-and-fun sprees as new Hilton hotels are added to the international chain within the next couple of years.

That the junket is still a good investment—especially when you can get British Overseas Airways Corp. (BOAC) to help pick up the tab—is clearly evidenced in the high-polished showmanship delivered by the Hilton toppers, directed by John Joseph, public relations director of Hilton Hotels Corp., and more-than-ably assisted by Henry Benner who heads the PR department of Hilton Hotels International. BOAC's PR director, Gilbert Carter, obviously worked closely with the Hilton boys to come up with service par excellence.

It was solid thinking to wrap up both the London and Athens openings in one junket, since it stimulated an attendance of some 125 persons including Hilton execs and members of the news media such as syndicated columnists Earl Wilson, Bob Considine and other Fourth Estaters.

Feature and travel writers, including Richard Joseph of Esquire, and from Europe, South America, the U.S. and Canada also accepted the invitation to live in Californa for the period which began Sunday (14) and wound up Tuesday (23) when the BOAC jet returned to New York after the party had spent five days in London, and three days in Athens.

Also very much worth noting is that, unlike Hilton junkets of other years, this one had a minimum of show biz representation from the viewpoint of, again as in other years, name performers who came along and delivered nothing but their presence.

Per the money invested—this junket was said to have cost upwards of $80,000 plus more than as much again when you add the fringe benefits and hidden expenses—everybody must be counted upon to deliver a fair return on the investment.

Quid-Pro-Quo-Pundits

Thus, instead of having "celebrities" that weren't always that "celebrated," and with the press corps not too impressed by the names who were there only for what they could get out of it, the strategy is now to replace the "non-productive" absentees with news media reps who can be counted upon to quid-pro-quo the junket with some airtime or space in the papers.

These personalities from show business—mainly singer Jane Morgan and dancer-humorist Ray Bolger—who were on hand for the London and Athens openings, did deliver generously: the former with smash results at the informal London Hilton Rooftop Restaurant party and at the Athens Hilton ball, and the latter as an infectious personality who helped keep the party going for 10 days.

Bolger also clicked at the roof-top shindig, and came up with unexpected specialties as joining the native girl dancers in another ad lib exhibition, during the one-day excursion to the island of Hydra, approximately 1½ hours by boat from Athens.

Also present and producing was Fred Robbins, New York deejay, who was never without his taping machine.

Business Brass Also

Although the number of actual performers on the junket was minimal, the show biz fraternity was well-represented by those execs who have plenty of show biz contact. Joe Binns, senior vp of Hilton Hotels Corp., now masterminding the upcoming New York Hilton, was present; Aldo Dunn Carpenter, g.m. of the Savoy Hilton; Col. Henry Crown, close business associate of Conrad N. Hilton; Peter Howard, coordinator of the N.Y. Hilton; Donald Mumford, g.m. of the Queen Elizabeth Hotel, Montreal, and v.p., Hilton Hotels International; H. J. O'Connell of Montreal, a 50% partner in the under-construction Montreal Airport Hilton; Serge Semenenko, vicechairman, First National Bank of Boston; and William Peluso, Hilton International's sales director.

Some of the events attracted show biz personalities such as Monica Mosinger, ex-legit actress, now doing a chatter column for the Houston Press; British actor Robert Morley, who emceed the London ball with UNICEF as the beneficiary; and others.

Both hotels, London and Athens, have that Hilton touch, reflected very-much so in the program set up for the junketeers, with heavy emphasis on showmanship in the way of boat rides up the Thames and to Hydra near Athens; dances in native garb and decor symbolizing the atmosphere of traditional Ye Olde Englande and classic Greece.

The only entertainment to speak of, aside from Jane Morgan's effective songalogy, was at the London Ball, where the international show ingredients included the Kelie Imperial Ballet (Orient); The Kingston Trio (North America); Le Varel & Bailly Chateurs de Paris (Europe); chanteuse Nana Mouskouri (Greece); and the Merina y Alberto Argentine ballet (South America.)

As of now, there is no set entertainment policy either at the London Hilton or Athens Hilton.

Salad Spill in Mpls. Cafe Gets 20-G Dressing In Dropped Patron's Suit

Minneapolis, April 30.

Joseph P. and Raymond T. Duffy, co-owners of the local Duff nightclub, and Billy Martin, onetime N.Y. Yankees and later Minnesota Twins second baseman have been named defendants in a $20,000 damage suit brought in District Court here by Fred Molitor, of Worthington, Minn.

Molitor charges that Martin "willfully, wantonly and maliciously assaulted and beat" him in the bistro on Feb. 11. The alleged offense occurred after Martin accidently bumped into a waitress causing a salad she was carrying to spill on Molitor. It's claimed a fight then ensued and the plaintiff suffered the injuries.

Punitive damages of $10,000 are wanted from Martin and a similar amount from the Duffys because the latter allegedly violated the law "by allowing intoxicating liquors to be sold" to the ex-baseball player.

In a motion filed later, Molitor seeks an additional $300 from Martin, or $10,300 in all, as a default judgement because, it's claimed the latter failed to file an answer to his complaint in the time prescribed by law. The Duffys have filed their answer.

Prior to opening their Duff nightclub, the Duffys handled the concessions at the Twins stadium and have a large baseball players' following.

LATIN QTR., N.Y., FOLDS ITS COSTUME PLANT

After years of manufacturing its own costumes, the Latin Quarter, N.Y., is discontinuing the practice and will farm out fabrication of its garb to other concerns. It's anticipated that a major portion of the costumes will be made in France and Italy. The LQ long operated the Elcee Costume Co. with a plant in Manhattan.

Rising costs of maintaining the factory, coupled with increased labor expenses, sparked the decision to shutter the workshop. It was originally started by former operator Lou Walters at a time when the Latin Quarter shows were being sent out as vaude and cafe units and duplicate costumes were necessary. Since then, the Elcee Costume Co. has manufactured costumes mainly for shows in the N.Y. nitery.

Industrial Show Better Sales Aid For Small Mfr. Than TV, Sez Art Jarwood

Industrial shows can be utilized more effectively for the small manufacturer than television spots, according to Arthur Jarwood, Raleigh Clothes exec who has been utilizing traveling shows to break into new markets and stimulate sales in areas where his company is already established.

Jarwood is the former operator of the Riobamba and Famous Door, both N.Y., in the swing and swoon eras when both were important showcases for acts and bands.

A smallie cannot afford to buy huge chunks of time on networks, Jarwood points out. Besides, he claims, commercials art much like bushshot. While they get a wide circulation, much of it is wasted and cannot be harnessed directly to sales.

Jarwood has already staged shows in Gimbels, N.Y., and Carson, Pirie & Scott, Chicago. He is now working on a show for a department store chain headquartered in San Francisco.

Jarwood says the major result that pleased both department store officials and his firm was the fact that the Gimbel store registered $2,300 in sales of his product on the same evening of the show, and there has been a considerable upbeat since then. Strategy, he adds, is to involve entire sales staffs as well so that the effect of the show will linger long after it has gone.

Moreover, stores like the prospect of live shows on their premises because it creates traffic. Prospect of seeing a name performer for free, Jarwood emphasizes, brings in customers who might have bypassed the store that day. He feels that this is an area that could be explored more thoroughly as an employment outlet for talent.

He stresses that there are vast areas in the U.S. without any means of live entertainment. With proper exploitation, he feels, those mercantile displays with live talent can revive an interest in entertainment with "round" actors as well.

Buffalo, April 30.

To cap a chain of unlucky incidents, Myron Ross, operator of the Le Moulin Rouge Supper Club, was convicted in City Court here last week of issuing a fraudulent check. Since last December the Moulin Rouge has been charged with presenting indecent performances (Belle Barth), been involved in SLA license suspension proceedings, has filed a petition in bankruptcy court for reorganization and has been operating under a receivership.

Ross, following his conviction, was released on $1,000 bail pending probation investigation and sentencing May 9. The complainant, a wholesale meat dealer, is a creditor of the nitery for about $7,000 in unpaid deliveries, the present check being for $804.30 on a C.O.D. delivery last December.

Ross claimed that the dealer had been a guest at the Club and ran up a considerable bill on the cuff which he thought was to be credited against the check.

Late in the week, the final chapter in the history of Buffalo's nitery was written in bankruptcy court when both the Moulin Rouge and its financial sponsor, Buffalo Salad Bowl Inc., were declared bankrupt. Attorneys for the operators reported to the court that additional financial assistance to continue operation of the establishments could not be procured and that both had been closed.

Creditors' claims total more than $100,000. A trustee will be appointed to sell the assets and distribute the proceeds among creditors.

normal profits. The development is continuing into the present year and has been responsible to a considerable extent for the 1962 loss incurred by the talent agency. Statement also refers to television program development costs of $222,783.

Report also noted that the overall B-M profit came after depreciation of $482,078 and that the tax profits will be offset against a tax loss carry-forward, thereby eliminating any provision for Federal income tax otherwise payable. GAC loss carryover for period prior to Dec. 31, 1964 is $108,000.

Net working capital as of Dec. 31, 1962 was $2,122,883 and investment in affiliates was over $9,700,000. Depreciated net book value of property, plant and equipment was $4,082,173. Dividends totalling $872,971 were paid on the company's preferred stock, and a quarterly dividend of $113,730 was paid for the first quarter of this year.

Company also said it achieved a better position in its financial structure last year by retiring 200,110 shares of convertible preferred stock for $4,001,000 in 7% subordinated 10-year debentures. This move reduced the convertible preferred stock to 482,000 shares and increased by book value of the common stock by $2.02 per share.

Eileen O'Dare (Mrs. Ole) Olsen (& Johnson) has gotten up an attractive brochure of Rev. Robert W. Youngs' tribute to the late comedian, delivered by the minister of the First Presbyterian Church, Wichita, Kan., on Jan. 30 last. Miss O'Dare, who danced with the Olsen & Johnson company, is already working a book of the late John Sigurd (Ole) Olsen's theatrical memoirs. From their Miami Beach home she plans shuttling between Hollywood and Wichita, where Olsen's kin reside, while working on the biog. Miss O'Dare was a featured dancer in vaudeville before joining the "Hellzapoppin" comic on his solo U.S. army base tours, while Chic Johnson was himself ill.

A recent Divorce Court ruling in London in which Val Parnell, former boss of the Moss Empires group, and its flagship the London Palladium, and until his recent retirement, managing director of Associated Television, was ordered by the judge to return to his wife Helen, has puzzled some Americans, who are not familiar with this facet of British law. Such a procedure is normally regarded as providing grounds for action for judicial separation if the judge's order is not complied with. It can also effect a subsequent claim for maintenance, i.e. alimony.

Bahamas '62-'63 Season a Paradox: Peak Tourist Volume But Poor Biz

By BILL ELLIOTT

Nassau, April 30.

"Plenty tourists man, but where de business is?" That seems to be the cry resounding through these islands as the 1962-63 season moves into its final weeks.

Although government figures show that more visitors have come to the Bahamas than in any previous year, business men and shop owners are wondering where the spenders have been. Hotel, restaurant and nightclub operators, cab drivers and Bay St. store proprietors all complain that it has been a poor season despite the volume of tourists.

Cruise ships have never come in such large numbers as they have this winter, sometimes as many as seven having been in port on a single day. But merchants claim these people, many of whom are taking advantage of low-priced package deals, come ashore to look but not to buy. They go in groups to the nightclubs, have the one drink included in the tour price, see the show and then make for the exits en masse.

Many of these cruise parties, it is said, especially those headed from Nassau to more southerly ports in the Caribbean, are told aboard ship to wait until they get to free ports where greater bargains may be found.

Many in Nassau think a spiraling price structure in hotel room rates, meals, etc. has caused much unfavorable comment. The cruise ships in particular, it is claimed, are not bringing the same type of visitor who used to come and remain for one to two weeks or more. A growing commercialization and Americanization has robbed the area of some of its former charm according to some.

Also contributing to the declining volume of spending have been changes in U. S. laws, particularly the reduction from $500 to $100 the amount of goods purchased abroad that returnees may bring back to the States. Abolishing the policy which permitted tourists to mail home individual gifts costing under $10 will also hurt. The contention is that this privilege was abused by persons who purchased quantities of goods, then had the items sent home piecemeal thereby avoiding U. S. import duty.

Another big factor in the biz slide has been increased competition from the cruise ships themselves, many of which offer in shops aboard ship liquor, cameras, china and other items similar to those purchaseable in port but at lower prices. On the first of three cruises to Nassau this winter the Queen Elizabeth reportedly sold out practically everything she had in her shops, the first time this has happened since she served as a troop ship carrying G.I.s in the last war.

Having experienced a sub-par winter season, many hotels in Nassau are planning to close in the spring, some for as much as from five to seven months, including Pilot House, Balmoral, Coral Harbor Club, Lyford Cay Club and Huntington Hartford's posh Ocean Club at Paradise Island which, however, operates only seasonally. Others, such as the Emerald Beach one telecast a week basis, Four and Nassau Beach, are heavily booked, especially with large conventions, and are expecting a healthy summer season.

Anticipated closings will put quite a lot of hotel staffers out of work, adding to the unemployment picture which has not been bright in general the past year although recently picking up in the construction industry.

While summer business has been reasonably good in the past few years, it is hoped that the Development Board's extensive ad campaign in both the U.S. and Europe will keep visitors flocking to these shores during the hot weather. However, the present outlook for this resort area, geared almost exclusively to a tourist economy, is not as rosy as it might be.

Basie Band to Unveil Small's Paradise West

Hollywood, April 30.

KDAY disk jock Tommy Small is opening a new L.A. nitery, which will book names. Site is a new building that originally was to have housed a private club. Small unveils May 10 with Count Basie band on four-day booking; thereafter runs will be two weeks.

Spot will be called Small's Paradise West, as the jock is from the family which for many years ran Small's Paradise, a Harlem club which was sold to basketballer Wilt Chamberlain in 1960.

After booking here, Basie flies to Honolulu for May 23-24 gigs promoted by Ralph Yempuku, thence to Japan for two weeks of bookings being set up by Tats Nagashima.

41st Milan Fair Ends Clicko Run

Milan, April 29.

Many a world's fair would give its eye-teeth to match the Milan Fair which had its 41st running this year between April 12 and 25 with exhibits from 84 countries, nine more than a year ago by nearly 4,000 exhibitors.

Covering 4,304,000 square feet in a built-up area of Europe's most burgeoning industrial city, the Milan Fair has nowhere to go but up. Thought has been given to moving to a suburban area but it couldn't have everything ready in one year. Thus, it added more than 20,000 square feet of space this year by additional pavilions on rooftops and higher floors. The built-up area totaled near 2,500,000 square feet of space.

Show biz comes in for more than a fair share of the fair. Outside of MIFED, the movie, documentary and tv market, there was floor space devoted to tv industry, jukeboxes and phonograph records. Outdoor recreational items, particularly boats, had a large pavilion this year and more space devoted to games and devices for home entertainment. Home movies were a dominant item in the photographic display by countries all over the world.

RAI-TV, the Italian network, had an exhibit of tv in the future and utilized the fair theatre for originating many of its broadcasts. FIAT, Italy's major motor distributor, devoted its pavilion to films of the past 60 years on screens of three sizes, the last in color and widescreen. Montecatini, another Italo major producer of chemicals and plastics among 400 products, also offered a film story of its 75-year history.

AGVA 'Failed to Collect' His 5G From Diana Dors So D.C. Nitery Op Sues

Washington, April 30.

Leo Zieger, boniface of the Casino Royal here, has filed a $5,000 damage suit against the American Guild of Variety Artists, claiming the union failed to collect that amount from Diana Dors for him. The suit was brought in the D.C. Court of General Sessions.

Zieger charged that Miss Dors failed to play a one-week contract in his nitery starting July 6, 1961. He said the D.C. AGVA chapter approved a $5,000 claim against her (the fee she was to have been paid for the week). He said the singer-actress twice appealed the judgment to N.Y. headquarters, which both times affirmed his $5,000 claim.

Zieger contends it is AGVA's responsibility to collect from Miss Dors for him and that the union has not done so. His suit seeks to make the union pay him.

Pitt Arson Squads Probe 650G Blaze That Razed Vogue Dinner Theatre

Pittsburgh, April 30.

The Vogue Terrace Dinner Theatre, which opened just two weeks ago (10) was destroyed in a fire that roared through the building at 4:30 a.m. Wednesday (24) morning, killing the company's stage manager, Gene Miller.

"Annie Get Your Gun," starring Ginger Rogers, had been the current production and was playing to capacity houses every night. On Tuesday (23), just a few hours before the blaze, more than 600 patrons were watching the show. Not much is known what actually caused the blaze but if the fire had come six hours earlier, it might have resulted in a greater holocaust than the Cocoanut Grove fire in Boston in November, 1942.

This possibility was discounted by fire marshals who contend that the building went too fast to have been caused by anything less than a planned arson job. They also said that if there were any people around, the blaze could have been extinguished or that the customers could have easily been led to the many exits.

Miller was the only casualty. He had gone to a bank to make a night deposit with club manager, Tony Mowod. Mowod returned with Miller and then left for home while the stage manager went to his room. About 20 minutes later, restaurant manager Elmer Willet was awakened by the smoke. He rushed to the rooms of producers Carl Low and Dick Scanga and awakened them.

The three men then searched for Miller who was the only other person living in the Vogue Terrace proper. They tried to reach his room but flames pushed them back. Miller's body was found in the debris about four hours later.

Damages to the building and theatre were estimated to be about $500,000 for the property and $150,000 for the theatre which had just been built as part of the club's huge remodeling program.

The Vogue Terrace building had been a county landmark for 75 years. It started as a home and was made into a hotel before the second World War. Bill Household built the auditorium portion just before the war and operated it for four years before renting it to Andy Chakeres, who now has the Horizon Room here.

Chakeres sold the nightclub and hotel to John Bertera, now owner of the Holiday House. Other owners followed Bertera with spotty success. When the Dinner Theatre people took it over, it was considered an excellent move for both parties and the plan met with immediate response by the Pitt public. Every night of "Annie Get Your Gun" had at least 500 people with the room going clean on Friday and Saturday nights.

Co-producer Scanga said that he has been overwhelmed by offers from other nightclubs and bowling alleys to transfer his future shows there. He stated that he would make a decision before next week but added that his greatest desire was to rebuild the Vogue Terrace because "this is the type of club where the dinner theatre idea can most properly be presented."

Scanga said that there were many large nightclubs around the country that could be saved with the dinner theatre idea and in the same process could bring the road back for theatrical productions.

He pointed out that he has discussed the matter with Harry Altman, who owns the Town Casino in Buffalo, and that he has also looked at such rooms as the Three Rivers in Syracuse.

On the Sunday (21) before, Pitt's most luxurious private club, the Beau Brummel which was built at a cost of over $400,000, burned to the ground during the early morning hours. Fire officials flatly declared that the fire was caused by an arsonist.

The Beau Brummel is next door to the Nixon Theatre, the legit house, which had been playing "Lawrence of Arabia." Smoke and water caused damage to the house but the $11,000 print of "Lawrence" was saved along with two special lenses costing $6,000 apiece. Owner Gabe Rubin expects to resume the run of the picture in about three weeks.

The private club was reduced to street level and was just as total a loss as the Vogue Terrace.

Johnny Mathis Beats Assault Rap in Hub But Judge Chides Him

Boston, April 30.

Singer Johnny Mathis had an assault and battery case against him dismissed in South Boston District Court Friday (26) after a 22-year-old girl refused to press charges, but nabbed a tonguelashing from the judge.

Mathis was accused by Miss Carol Repucci of Revere of striking her when she tried to take his picture Jan. 16 at Blinstrub's nitery in South Boston. At that time, the girl reported that Mathis had slapped her in the face. The case was postponed after Mathis failed to appear for trial on April 15.

Judge Thomas E. Linehan, lecturing Mathis, told him: "As a public figure . . . you should watch your actions." The judge ordered Mathis to take his hands out of his pockets as the case was called.

2 Federal Agencies Probing AGVA; BLMR Eyes Union's Nitery Bonds

Despite the fact that the American Guild of Variety Artists has been operating in a more subdued manner than previously, its woes have diminished little since the change from Jackie Bright in the national administrative secretary post to Bobby Faye. As a matter of fact, the union's worries have increased somewhat for a second Federal agency is continuing an intensive probe into its operations.

The Bureau of Labor Management Reports has been examining AGVA for the past four months. The Senate Subcommittee on Permanent Investigations, headed by Sen. John L. McClellan, is also continuing its research into the union's affairs. In addition, it's anticipated that AGVA's Financial report for last year will show an operating deficit of $65,000.

The McClellan Committee was originally slated to hold a short hearing on AGVA in January. The session was later scheduled for an April date. However, it's believed that with additional evidence mounting, delays will give the committee time to digest its findings more thoroughly.

The Bureau of Labor Management Reports has had several men in the AGVA office looking into many facets of its operations. Most nitery owners, for example, recently received letters from BLMR investigators asking whether the amount of their bond, as stipulated by union records, is correct. There is presently about $800,000 in the AGVA bond account which is banked separately from its operating funds.

Crosbys' Contribution

Robstown, Tex., April 30.

A $3,500 gift by Mrs. Kathryn (Bing) Crosby and her singer-husband will help build an amphitheatre in the new city here. The former Kathy Grant is a Texas girl.

The construction of the amphitheatre is now assured, said mayor R. D. Berryman.

BILL COSBY
Comedy
30 Mins.
Bitter End, New York

Negro comedian Bill Cosby reportedly started out in the tracks of Dick Gregory with a lot of hip race material. He has greatly expanded his chances with a switch to a completely colorless line, nonetheless colorful in its highly original imaginative reaches. His fanciful, satirical narratives, done with sharp timing and dramatic pause, mark him as a new addition to the new school comics. Explored are such items as Superman's reaction when he's caught by a cop changing clothes in a phone booth, and what happened to the Super suits the comic-strip character keeps dropping around when they're picked up and worn by wino scavengers, or the New York subway system, which provides a nut for every car, assayed as though it were a Broadway musical.

The bits, his own, may be vaguely reminiscent of Lenny Bruce back in the days when the vet terrible infant was quotable. But any similarity derives from compatible satirical goals rather than any imitation. And Cosby's clean-cut American stage presence (he was a two-letter man at Temple U., working his way through via nitery turns) is a long way from Bruce's bitter burlesque.

Reportedly one of Cosby's hopes is to do a regular second-banana tv stint a la Carl Reiner. It's a conceivable goal for that day when the Bleached medium (whiter than white) removes some of the bleach from prime time. The hungry i he can play tomorrow. Bill.

DON CRAWFORD
Songs, Comedy
25 Mins.
Inquisition, Vancouver

Don Crawford, formerly teamed with bassist-arranger Kaye Dunham, has reconstituted his turn as a single after the brief hiatus taken when Dunham split to join a jazz combo, and debuts here as a New Act. Crawford, previously billiard-ball, skull-shaven, now has a plentiful crop of black hair, but hirsute vigor apart, the new act this youthful Negro entertainer has fashioned looms as a potent entry for any intimate showroom.

Crawford has a pungent, musical voice, accompanies himself with solid 6- and 12-string guitar work, and has a well-balanced set of tunes, but it is the hip way he intersperses entertaining patter and intro comments between songs that stamps his vocal and instrumental talents with an individual quality of professional showmanship. And it is his acting experience that provides him with the polish to sound infectiously spontaneous and reap the benefits of enthusiastic audience reaction.

Crawford cries out for waxing by a major diskery and should pay off handsomely for any situation able to exploit his strong entertainment assets. He is also visually OK for tv. Show.

THE SOUNDS OF ED MONTGOMERY
Musical, Variety
70 Mins.
Hartman, Columbus, O.

Employing a mixed chorus of 20, symphonic orchestra of 20 and soloist, The Sounds of Ed Montgomery seems an excellent bet for large night clubs, concerts and tv appearances. Montgomery produces a wide range of vocal and instrumental sounds, smartly-styled and projected with authority.

The chorus is placed on angled platforms, bisecting the orchestra. The 10 male and 10 female vocalists present not only a smart appearance but sing with competence. Strings and wind instruments are well-balanced. The numbers range from a "Green Sleeves" takeoff on Lombardo, Cugat and Kenton to adaptation of Chopin's E Minor Prelude "Funny Valentine," "Streets of Laredo," "Fool Am I," "Smilin' Through," "Brazil" and a rousing college-type run-through of "Grand Old Ivy" from "How to Succeed," complete with pennant-wavers and drum majorettes. Soloists include Joan Elfenerman, Nancy Walz, Ruth Harter, Jack Steiger, Tom Fuhrman, Beatrice Stette and The Hair Cuts, comedy trio. Montgomeryholsters and announces the numbers in informal manner. Pope.

JOHN GABRIEL
Songs
25 Mins.
Living Room, N.Y.

Mingling a jazz flavor with a winning cabaret vocal style, John Gabriel is a personable young singer who presents his material in an easy-going yet strongly effective way. Mixing the tempo with ballads and more driving material, he builds audience appeal nicely and entertains with a smooth and somewhat sophisticated air.

Backed by a jazz-styled trio, Gabriel essays the likes of "Just In Time," "Once Upon a Time" and other smoothly-fashioned bits. His "Mimi's Back In Town" is a hip and groovy swinger and he ballads strongly on "What Kind of Fool Am I." He gets the audience into the act with their invited fingersnapping participation on "Gonna Build a Mountain" and perches comfortably on a stool for a ballad rendition of "Make Someone Happy." He also gets off a swinging turn with "Come Rain, Come Shine."

The singer avoids the use of much patter and leaves the aud to identify the songs for themselves. A pleasant personality nonetheless is evident in his vocal presentation and this, plus smooth and hip singing style makes him a good bet for the atmosphere of a cozy nitery like the Living Room which appeals to a fairly knowing set. Kali.

MICHELLE TRIOLA
Songs
18 Mins.
Playboy, Phoenix

Michelle Triola, tiny enough to double for a politician's watch fob, trills a hearty song with assurance and poise. Fetchingly garbed in a pale blue Grecian tunic to accentuate her olive complexion and ebony coiff, the little hummingbird markets a tasty catalog of oldies spiced with special bits tailored to match her pipes.

Miss Triola is a no-nonsense chirper who apparently believes a singer's job is to sing—and sing she does with a charming disarmingly shy demeanor nixing the distracting chatter and gestures. She bows on to "My Heart Belongs To Daddy," slides into "Spring Can Really Hang You Up The Most," segues a bouncy "I Feel Pretty" and exits to "Johnny With The Gentle Hands." O'Har.

DICK LYNN
Comedy
25 Mins.
Playboy, Phoenix

Dick Lynn's solid, earthy humor is typical of comics whose technique was incubated on the Chicago saloon circuit. Lynn, one of the better zanies to play this Phoenix branch of the Hefner chain, bears the mark of a definite comer. His script is highly original, fresh and honed to a razorsharp barb. He eschews the one-liners but leans heavily on topical situation stuff. He apes pompous politicians, little, gentle old ladies and tv, earning prosperous palming all the way. He can be caustic or courteous with equal ease.

Highlight of the turn is a carbon of Charles Laughton. Lynn is a can't-miss for video guest-shots and can carry his load on any nitery bill. O'Har.

BARBARA BRIAN
Songs
24 Mins.
Gatineau, Ottawa

Former Montreal steno Barbara Brian is new (six months) in the pro chirp business but already shows signs of solid savvy. Pipes are nice and looks are plenty. There's room for improvement in staging, but she knows it and is working on it.

Canary is six feet tall but her height is so neatly distributed it adds to the impact. She's auburn-topped and stacking is nice but not boisterous, well-gowned in extremely tight black. Routine ranges from upbeat to ballads.

At show caught (25) the tablesitters were restlessly awaiting the hilltopping Johnny Puleo stint but gave Miss Brian plenty of attention and solid mitting. As is, she is good for niteries, lounges, tv, AM and disks. With experience and more savvy, she could ring louder bells. Gorm.

YOEL SHARR
Songs, Instrumental
20 Mins.
Sabbra, N.Y.

Yoel Sharr, an Israeli import, is a versatile performer who does many things well. He sings, plays guitar and piano, and has a grasp of many schools of chirping. His display at the Sabbra is a venture into many fields. He sings in Israeli and English, puts over a comedy number, and plays an extremely fine classical piano. He seems like he has been around the music halls as well as cafes.

Sharr, while impressing as an all-around talent, seemingly diffuses his impact with work in so many fields. He takes the edge off his singing with his instrumental work, and since singers seem to have the best chance of making it big, perhaps greater concentration on this facet of his work would ultimately better serve his ends. Jose.

SUSAN SMITH
Songs
20 Mins.
Smith Court Inn, N. Y.

Susan Smith, a well-stacked femme, makes her first viewing in New York. She indicates that she can make it strong on the nitery circuits, but at this point she has a few items that need correction. Major fault is the equal intensity given all her tunes. However, this could easily be the fault of the spot, since the Smith Court Inn is a rather noisy boite with a large bar biz which is not conducive to tomblike silence.

Miss Smith, however, seems able to interpret tunes from many angles. She has a sense of humor, great vitality, and knows how to treat a ballad well. She shows many facets in her turn including ability to speak informally to audiences. Jose.

GIA NINA
Songs
25 Mins.
Executive Club, Knoxville

Gia Nina, of Spanish descent, sings well in three languages. She is personable and attractive with a good wardrobe to back her personality.

Featured songs range from popular to Latin classics. She has a fine, medium-ranged voice. Audience reception is excellent as she runs through her variety of vocals.

Her favorites include songs in Italian, Spanish and flavored and piping English. Some of these offers are "Birth of the Blues," "Lover Man," "You Belong to My Heart" and "Sorrento." Her know-how on the stage of either the intimate or large nitery will help her on the circuit. Brad.

ALLEN & GRIER
Folk Satire
30 Mins.
Bitter End, New York

There was bound to be more of a reaction to the smothering heaps of cracked corn all over the popular media than just "My Son the Folk Singer," and here comes a young couple (married) with a mean shovel.

Alen & Grier, at the Greenwich Village Bitter End, fret, stomp and wail parodies of sea chanteys, dainty 15th century airs, work songs and rock 'n' roll.

Examples: "It's better to be rich than ethnic, that's the American way"; "Basketball Bill Don't shave points in a basketball game, shave on tv for Gillette"; "Teenage Mother", and a white collar work song for Chock Full O'Nuts counter-workers.

Young and good looking couple may strive a bit more than the material requires, but the hokking has some richly comic moments. Femme side of the duo tries a straight folk ballad for fair returns, but a turn of straight comedy would suffice. A good disk possibility, and word is they have one on the way. Bill.

tion could hit $400,000 if a 15% overcall is exercised on a $400,000 stake, and "Here's Love," a musical version of the film, "Miracle on 34th Street." The capitalization on "Love" is $400,000.

The budgets on these projected productions are in keeping with such outlays as the $401,000 capitalization for "Tovarich," now in its seventh week at the Broadway theatre, N.Y., and the financing at $400,000 with provision for 20% overcall of "Hot Spot," now in its third week at the Majestic Theatre, N.Y. Probably the top expense for a recent Broadway musical was incurred by "Camelot" which cost around $673,000 to produce.

Among the more expensive straight plays this season were "Lorenzo," capitalized at $180,000, including 20% overcall, and "My Mother, My Father and Me," financed at $175,000. Entries such as "The Beauty Part" and "The Milk Train Doesn't Stop Here Anymore" involved investments of $165,000 each, including 10% overcall, and such shows as "Harold" and "In the Counting House" were capitalized at $150,000, including 20% overcall.

Getting back to the upcoming musicals "Jennie" with Mary Martin as star, is being co-produced by her husband, Richard Halliday, and Cheryl Crawford. The tuner, based on the early acting career of Laurette Taylor, has a book by Arnold Schulman and songs by Howard Dietz and Arthur Schwartz.

"Prince" is to be produced by Herman Levin. The book for the musical has been adapted by Harry Kurnitz and the music and lyrics are by Noel Coward. Joe Layton is to direct and choreograph. Coward and Kurnitz are to share in 9% of the show's gross and Levin is to get 1% as producer. Rattigan Productions Ltd., which owns the original play, is to receive 2% of the gross.

"Sugar," slated for production by Marquis de la Passardiere, is to star his French wife, Lilo, in the role originated by Marlene Dietrich in the 1930 German film version of "The Blue Angel." The picture, based on Heinrich Mann's novel, was also worked over as a play by Mann and a collaborator, in addition to being remade as a film in 1959 by 20th-Fox with May Britt as femme lead.

The book for "Sugar" was written by Dan Appell, the music by Duke Ellington and the lyrics by Marshall Barer. Scheduled to share in the weekly gross on the production are George Marton, representing Mann's estate, 1½%; Ellington, 3% Barer, 3%, and Appell, 3½%.

"Ben Franklin," with book and lyrics by Sidney Michaels and music by Mark Sandrich Jr., is on the production agenda of George W. George and Frank Granat. The authors are to share in 6% of the gross and the management is to get 1% of the take for producer services.

"Love," with book, music and lyrics by Meredith Willson, is being produced by Stuart Ostrow.

House Review

Apollo, N.Y.

Duke Ellington Orch (13), Bunny Briggs, Arnold Dover, Leeta Harris, Jimmy Smith; "All Night Long" (Colorama Features).

It's old home week at the Apollo this frame with Duke Ellington's band, featuring such august jazz artists as Cootie Williams, Johnny Hodges, Jimmy Hamilton, Ray Nance and others. Thus the band obviously has the familiar Ellington sound, and drives it home with such Ellington evergreens as "A Train," "Rockin' in Rhythm," "I Got It Bad," "Do Nothin' Till You Hear from Me," items from the "Black, Brown & Beige Suite" and others.

There's some current Ellington too—"Silk Lace," "Afropeco" and others— with fine solos by Hamilton on clarinet and Nance on violin. Milt Grayson handles the vocal assignment well with rich baritone jazz stylings on Ellington standards.

Slamming jazz organist Jimmy Smith closes a long show (nearly two hours) with blues crescendos that shake the house. Hefty Leeta Harris does a comic strip (winding in knee-length bloomers). Comedian Arnold Dover is best with his innumerable impressions, and it's old home week too for Bunny Briggs, who augments his sensational spastic rhythms with a nice middle-range vocal on "It's a Good Day." Bill.

However, some believe that the nitery and restaurant business will come back to the level which prevailed before the new Internal Revenue regulations were promulgated.

Bureau of Internal Revenue spokesmen from chief Mortimer S. Caplin down, have declared that the essential modus operandi has not changed, only complete records of each expenditure will have to be kept. The cafe owners feel that as soon as these explanations receive complete circulation nitery and restaurant entertainment of clients and customers will reach normal levels.

Normally, there is a pickup this time of year. For the past two weeks there were school holidays, and youthful entertainer Paul Anka drew a lot of college trade at the Copacabana. Basin St. East was also able to get some of the upbeat from the students. Easter travel upped the business at other spots, particularly the Latin Quarter.

Some intimeries had a dip, however. The Wally Cox-Anne Francine bill at the Blue Angel created little excitement, but the Plaza 9 Room at the Plaza Hotel continued rope's up business. The regulation hotel rooms also picked up during this period. All are hopeful that the upbeat will continue.

The owners have the prom season to look forward to. An upbeat amount of visitors during June is likely to create more b.o. excitement than they have been accustomed to of late.

The latter will play for the final three weeks of the season.

Sands, Las Vegas

Las Vegas, April 24.

Peter Lind Hayes, Mary Healy, Chubby Checker, Harry Nofal, Antonio Morelli Orch (10), Copa Girls (12); produced & staged by Jack Entratter; choreography, Renne Stuart; stage direction, Harold Dubrow; $4 minimum.

Peter Lind Hayes and Mary Healy are doing their 12th stand in the Copa Room. Hayes, who writes his own act, as usual comes up with original humor in dialog and situations which appeal to both eggheads and lunkheads. ("Vaughn Meader may be the first actor ever assassinated by a President.")

Airline execs may take a dim view of Hayes' portrayal of a tipsy pilot, but it's a surefire yuck puller. His "Fallen Star" skit—about a washed-up Oscar winner sitting on a Central Park bench—brings laughs, tears, and has a surprise ending; it could become a classic identification piece for Hayes like Red Skelton's old man watching a parade.

Miss Healy is prettier than ever; Hayes ideally molds her fine singing talent with his offbeat brand of humor which is complete with audacious, exaggerated props. Revived is a Hayes-inspired gimmick used here several years ago before it was perfected—closed-circuit tv, where the faces of community singers in the audience are magnified on a large screen. Technical difficulties caused the dinner show audience to see a fuzzy picture, but it was bright and sharp for the midnighters. Special credit for success of the act should go to Burt Farber, who conducted the Antonio Morelli orch (10) for Hayes and Miss Healy.

Chubby Checker is back, this time not so chubby and not so twisty. He devotes most of his turn to songs, with one glance back at his Twist trademark, and one bit of limbo dancing. Sy Oliver is superb at the baton, guiding Checker on such numbers as "Yes Indeed," "Blue Skies," "Around The World," "I'm On My Way," and a vocal salute to Israel.

Renne Stuart production number, featuring singer Harry Nofal and the dozen Copa lovelies, is the curtain-raiser.

Dallas, April 25.

"Bottoms Up, '63," musical revue produced by Breck Wall, Joe Peterson; directed by Wall, Jimmie Thompson; special material, Jimmie & Johnny Thompson, Kenny Jerome, Jerry Myron, Bernie Kuby, Joe Peterson, Murray Grand, Al Engelhard, Bill Fanning; musical arrangements, Johnny Thompson; choreography, Carl Tressler; costumes, Peterson; lighting, Raley Chennault; features Bill Fanning, Breck Wall, Sondra Wolf, Suzanne Malone, Carl Tressler, Jan Sutton, Hazel Rippe, Nancy Austin, Kenny Jerome; Bill Williams Orch (7); $1.50-$2 cover.

This is the seventh intimate revue produced locally in the last five years by the successful Breck Wall-Joe Peterson team and, with a capable writing crew and a multi-talented cast, they have another click. This fifth edition of "Bottoms Up" contains surefire sketches and blackouts, some exciting terping and should lure local patronage to the plush Century Room for the next three months.

Again it's a sophisticated, swiftly paced revue that packs mucho entertainment into the 90-minute outing and the tablers respond generously to the fresh sketches and risque blackouts. The lusty nitting at admission that again even the bluest lines are relished as the seven local talents and two imports (Nancy Austin and Kenny Jerome) skit, sing, dance and bid away to a hegoff.

After song, "The First Five Rows," intoning the entire cast, Miss Austin, 300-pound comedienne in a ballet costume, pipes suggestive lyrics of "I Always Say Hello to the Flowers" for laughs. Sketch, "Fan Club Presidents," is a riotous bit by the Thompson writing team, which they authored on their own "Crabgrass and Chicken Fat" revue at another spot last year. Another sketch from the same show, "Mother Goose," holds up well with Bill Fanning as an imbibing "mother" on a radio quiz.

"Return of the Cocktail Party" features four boys and four femmes in a sophisticated spoof; Fanning, Miss Austin and Suzanne Malone click in a domestic skit, "The Staff," for yocks. Wall is good in a gold lame suit, with others in black leather jackets, in a Presley takeoff, "Are We Too Young?" Carl Tressler's dancing, abetted in the leg work by Jan Sutton and Hazel Rippe, is tops, in the "Bunburst" terp routine featuring strobiite costumes. Jerome is a fine talent, scoring in "The Movies" outing with Miss Austin. The four femme leshers move easily and there's extra gam display with numerous costume changes.

Revue is set for a 12-week run.

Melody Room, L. A.

Los Angeles, April 24.

Arthur Walsh, Jeannie Sterling, Frank Perry, Bill Peterson, Ron Kramer; no cover, two-drink minimum.

Former standup comic Arthur Walsh has gathered unto himself a pair of able assistants (singer Jeannie Sterling and pianist-musical director Frank Perry), known as "and Company," for what should give this uninhibited room a long and successful run. Somewhere along an evening's way, customers are in for a pint-sized "Hellzapoppin."

Walsh, a deceptively meek and mild type, rattles off a non-stop string of one-liners, licks off a vocal, kibitzes his pretty assistant's solo number, squelches an over-exuberant customer, does a fire-eating bit and even sells boxes of "candy" to a drinking crowd without changing expression or slowing down from his jet-propelled pace. His one wise-to-drop skit, a well-done but pace-slowing takeoff on an unemployed actor, might be a case of too much empathy in his audience.

Miss Sterling, a rousing, chandelier-shaking belter, plays it straight for most of her numbers, such as "A Good Man Is Hard To Find" and "Make Someone Happy" or delivers, with some outrageous pantomiming by Walsh, a hilarious "All Of Me." Perry, who also does a neat vocal on "Night and Day" to open the show, merges his pianistics with sideman Bill Peterson (trumpet) and Ron Kramer (drums) for a couple of swinging instrumentals. Otherwise they background Walsh and Miss Sterling.

Gig winds with an at-first suspicious candy pitch (at $1 a pc) with, of course, every purchaser winding up with a gag prize. Latter runs gamut from live fowl and animals (VARIETY now owns a duckling) to a seven-foot tall stuffed rabbit.

If trio can maintain pace they set at Tuesday's (23) opening, spot can expect a long stay. Booking, as of now, is for two weeks, five days.

Troubadour, L. A.

Los Angeles, April 24.

Jimmie Rodgers, Fairmount Singers (3), Ken Greenwald, $2 admission, one-drink minimum.

Perennially boyish balladeer Jimmie Rodgers has launched a three-week stand at this coffee house stop a bill that includes his trio of accompanists, the Fairmount Singers, and unconventional comic Ken Greenwald. Package is in through May 11.

Dot disker Rodgers does a dozen or so chiefly c&w ditties in the clean-cut, unassuming, personable manner that lifted him to the top of his field—that highly commercial hybrid sphere between folk music and pop. He may not fully satisfy purists of either form, but obviously there are a lot of folks who prefer it right down the middle.

Included in Rodgers' turn are requested disclicks the likes of "Kisses Sweeter Than Wine" and "Honeycomb," and lesser-known offerings such as "I Feel So Broken Up," "Long Before The Fall Winds Come" and "Old Ark's A' Moving." Fairmount Trio backs him effectively, enables him to engage in occasional humorous byplay, and works smoothly as a self-contained unit during Rodgers' break.

Greenwald, an expert at the sound-effects comedies popularized by Jonathan Winters, is an interesting and unorthodox comedy performer, but has yet to come into his own, chiefly owing to lapses in his material. Bulk of his act consists of satiric impressions and ribs of modern institutions, worthy targets ranging from the robot to tv commercial. Best bit is his opener, in which he slices through an imaginary wall to greet his audience.

International, N. Y.

Diana Dors, Sonny Sands, Beats McKenna Girls (10), Boys (4), Jill Kreuger; Mike Durso Orch; $5.50 minimum.

Although the current layout here has two new acts, otherwise it's the same "Las Vegas Follies" show which Jack Silverman has had here for weeks. But Diana Dors, making her first New York nightclub appearance, is boosting biz considerably.

Miss Dors, who has appeared in several American films as well as countless British screen vehicles, made her U.S. nitery debut nearly three years ago at the Dunes in Las Vegas. What was true of her work at that time goes double now that she has become more familiar with nightclub audiences.

Her act is well-gaited, and she has a stirring manner of selling a tune. While her voice is pleasing and deftly handled, the fact that she appears in the aura of a fascinating film star goes far in gaining aud attention.

Miss Dors has smartly retained the tune, "How Long Has This Been Going On", and has added several new songs in the pop category. It's Almost Like Being in Love" is a standout. Her opener, "Ain't Necessarily So," also was part of her original nitery act. "Could Be Start of Something Big" and "I Love Being Near You" are among her better-received numbers here.

Statuesque platinum-blond also tosses in some impressions, including Lena Horne, Marlene Dietrich, Mae West and Eartha Kitt. Latter could be omitted while the Mae West takeoff should be further developed. She scored easily with the patrons.

Sonny Sands obviously has been around, but mostly in Florida spots. He works hard, talks a blue streak but is not always funny. He has a honey-mooners' routine, one about politics, a prolonged bit around AGVA (few in the house appeared to know what he was talking about) and some repartee about Jerry Lewis. Sands had too many inside jokes for the crowd at show caught. His kidding-the-audience routine also wears thin.

Otherwise, it's the same production, step by step, song by song, and even down to "The Lady in Blue" number. This rather daring strip again winds up with Jill Kreuger minus most of her garb, with her peeling done by four lads. Mike Durso again is giving full show backing, and also plays for patron terping.

Riverside, Ottawa

Ottawa, April 24.

Janet Polan, Mel Johnson Orch (4); Claudette Auchu in lounge, $1 cover.

Temporary switch in show policy in the Riverside hotel's Rib Room gets away from the two-a-night that has been regular there. Currently, the Rib has the Mel Johnson foursome distributing its pleasant terp-or-listen music with chirper Janet Polan remaining on the stand throughout and performing her clicks canarying when the arstrengthening show-wise.

This has the looker in action almost constantly between nine p.m. and one a.m. and the customers dig it. But Miss Polan and the band would benefit from more attention to staging. The sound is nice. However, the view needs strengthening show-wise.

This policy is expected to hold until May 13 when Los Chavales de Espana come in. Rib Room's lounge has blond looker Claudette Auchu soloing on the Hammond organ.

Black Knight, Toronto

Toronto, April 24.

Georgia Drake, Palm De Luca Quintet, no cover.

Tall and brunet songstress Georgia Drake is on some 55 minutes in her thrice-nightly stint at the Black Knight, 120-capacity room at the Royal York Hotel, and warrants the lengthy time on her first Toronto visit.

She does her own arrangements and special material, her transposition of "Even on a Sunday" being particularly effective in having the customers, both male and female, laughing at themselves.

Poured into a black metallic gown, Miss Drake prowls around the tables with portable mike and captivates the well-heeled but noisy customers. She also sings foreign-language lyrics with power and dramatic abandon.

This starts with the singer's "I Enjoy Being a Girl" and her switch of style in "Mr. Wonderful," her "My Love," a "My Man" medley, her "Missy Lou," a medley of "Paris" songs and her climax of "Goodnight, Someone." Interpolated are "Coloring Book Song" and "Arrivederci."

With high hairdo, expressive face and dramatic delivery, the onetime schoolteacher had the audience in her mit. Miss Drake is a fine vocalist who can come back to the Black Knight room anytime.
McStay.

Port O' Call, St. Pete

St. Petersburg, April 24.

Nino Nanni, Kit Krockman & Showmen (5); no cover, no minimum.

Nino Nanni, "jester of the piano," opened in the Salon Rouge lounge at Port-O-Call Tuesday (23), bucking an off-night, sparse, early evening crowd and Guy Lombardo in the next room. With no intro, he hits the ivories with all the versatility of a pro and in his deep, husky voice lassoes listeners in a lively "Round The World" jaunt. By midnight the 200-capacity room was full.

"West Side Story" music provides Nanni scope for his force and understanding at the piano—and time to realize that the taste of Florida's Suncoast differs from its more sophisticated Goldcoast. His showmanship seems to stem from a musical metabolism which is equally at home with a tender love-song, a racy takeoff, narrative set to music or the worldly stories with which he spikes his act.

In the novelune "Get Out," he conducts a wild, wonderful trip to New Orleans, softens this with "What Is A Boy?" and frosts the treat with "Manhattan Tower" favorites. The Salon Rouge, with its lavish furnishings, provides perfect setting for his racy bit on Paris after dark.

Nanni, in for a four-week stay, is ably backed by bass fiddler Bob Rau; The Showmen space act with dance tunes. In the main dining room, warbler Jennifer Marshall is completing a two-week turn. Joan Fairfax will join Lombardo's Canadians May 10.

Golden Eagle, St. L.

St. Louis, April 9.

"Little Nell Is Still Alive," with Bill Rowley, Carole Hoffman, Bob Winters, Stillman Mosiovoy, Ann Steele; directed by Duane Jones.

The Golden Eagle in bustling Gaslight Square, heretofore a tippling spot only, minus shows, has now added entertainment, and the initial venture, oldtime "melier-drammer," is catching on fast.

Under the direction of Duane Jones, who also takes a hand with the acting chores on stage, the first production is "Little Nell Is Still Alive," or "The Switchman's Daughter," and out-frontiers are having a ball hissing the villian and cheering the hero and heroine. It's a lookable show as well as a listenable one with authentic vintage costumes from the melodrama era.

Along with Jones the cast features five talented young St. Louisans—Bill Rowley, Carole Hoffman, Bob Winters, Stillman Mosiovoy and Ann Steele, all of whom seem to be having every bit as much fun as the audience.

"Little Nell Is Still Alive" will run for six weeks, with similar melierdrammers to follow.

Ash Grove, L. A.

Los Angeles, April 24.

Joe & Rose Lee Maphis, Kentucky Colonels (4); $2 admission.

Two week booking of Joe & Rose Lee Maphis and the Kentucky Colonels provides another palatable package for the Beverly hillbilly at Ed Pearl's folk-nitery. Just plain old-fashioned a-pickin' an' a-singin', a-hummin' an' a-strummin', with some occasional whamdoodlin' thrown in for good measure. A little bit of ye olde National Barn Dance right in the heart of glamourpuss country.

Nimble-fingered Joe Maphis, a vet in the c&w field, executes a number of nifty solos on various string instruments—git tar, mandolin, autoharp—sometimes on his own, sometimes in accompaniment of his sweet warbling wife, Rose Lee, who picks away at her own guitar.

Versatile Kentucky Colonels (4) do blues, ballads and spirituals in the country-western idiom, and perform with zeal, vocally and instrumentally, giving the specialized audience precisely what it came for—an ear of corn.

Drake Hotel, Chi

Chicago, April 21.

Molly Bee, Jimmy Blade Orch; $2.50 cover.

Molly Bee has traded in her pigtails of a few years back for a form-fitting gold sheath dress and has discarded her ingenue image for that of a sophisticated ballad singer. She's a good prom time bet for the Camellia House for she will no doubt draw the Coke-and-corsage set because of her tv and record background.

Her current act is anything but kid stuff, and is clearly earmarked with her more than a dozen years of bigtime show biz experience. It is paced, pattered and timed with precision, and demonstrates that Miss Bee has a knowing way with a song and can establish rapport with an audience.

Miss Bee scores best with her numbers that utilize a strong beat, such as "Tell All The World," "End of the World" and "Cotton Fields." She also clicks with a bossa nova tempoed medley of "Fly Me To The Moon" and "Our Day Will Come."

Jimmy Blade does his usual impeccable job of backing the thrush and also provides a tiptop terp beat between shows.

Show is in for two weeks.

Living Room, N. Y.

Sally Blair, John Gabriel, Gene Brenner, $4.50 minimum.

This cozy eastside nitery has a solid show in its latest coupling of Sally Blair with newcomers John Gabriel and Gene Brenner. The threesome provides sock roundrobin entertainment to please the hipster set and those just looking for some enjoyable evening fare.

Miss Blair is a hip showman who has molded her sexy, alluring style into a magnetic audience holder. Essaying a variety of tunes with savvy jazz-inflected phrasing and a sophisticated touch, she gives the impression of enjoying her work and thereby puts the crowd in a mood to get her message best.

Her technique in handling tunes has the singer playing directly to each aud member. She also fields bad crowd manners, which are bound to crop up in a small spot like the Living Room, with finesse as instanced by the way she smartly shut up a boisterous cigaret customer on night caught.

Opening with a swinging "Got a Lot of Livin' to Do," the shapely Miss Blair grooves into a variety of numbers including a hip "The Best Is Yet to Come," "Lady Is a Tramp," "I Am in Love" and others. For some comedy she quips a bit with the aud and throws in some imitations of Lena Horne, Eartha Kitt and Pearl Bailey which work out well.

Also on the card are singer John Gabriel and comedian Gene Brenner, both of whom register in good effect (see New Acts) Withal, this latest Living Room outing is a pleasing and breezily entertaining show, well-tailored for the atmosphere of its intimate decor.

Bunny Bishop, Jack Elton, Steve LaFever; no cover, no minimum.

Blond, bedimpled Bunny Bishop has developed into one of the more reliable songbirds who perch periodically at this swank sanctuary for canaries. Her performing poise and vocal competence are reflected in the fact that the current two-week booking marks her sixth stint at Dino's.

Miss Bishop is not the kind of electrifying stylist around whom a cult of admirers is apt to form. She is, rather, a dependable singer with good musical taste, a reasonably keen ear and adequate vocal equipment to execute her melodic ideas with a minimum of pain or strain, fuss or muss. She also treats a lyric with respect.

Miss Bishop's set lasts a mere 15 minutes—five tunes, no false exits for prearranged "encores." Her musical inventory includes an unorthodox dramatic foray into the melodic intricacies of "Something's Coming," which ordinarily is a man's song.

Miss Bishop does not overwhelm an audience with her work, but she does hold its attention. At Dino's, that is a feat not to be dismissed lightly. The singer's efforts are sensitively and imaginatively reinforced by Jack Elton at the piano, Steve LaFever at the bass.

OBITUARIES

KENNETH MACGOWAN

Kenneth Macgowan, 74, professor emeritus of theatre arts at the U of California at Los Angeles, died April 27 in West Los Angeles, Calif. One of the pioneers of the Off-Broadway theatre, he later moved uptown where he produced 25 plays for Broadway.

He also produced 45 films in Hollywood for RKO, Paramount and 20th-Fox. He was a close friend of the late Eugene O'Neill which led him into a more active participation in legit production.

Macgowan started as assistant drama critic for the Boston Transcript, then became literary and motion picture critic for the old Philadelphia Evening Ledger. He later was reviewer for the N.Y. Evening Globe, Vogue and Theatre Arts.

It was a result of his friendship with O'Neill that he left criticism to devote his time to the Provincetown Playhouse in Greenwich Village from 1923 to 1926. While there, he also imported English plays in association with Joseph Verner Reed.

He then moved to Broadway,

Stillman and Stillman, died April 25 at his home in Westport, Conn.

A prominent theatrical attorney, he was named president of Seven Arts at the reorganization of the company in 1960. In association with Eliot Hyman and Ray Stark, he played an integral part in the development of Seven Arts into a major producer of motion pictures, Broadway legit productions, and a leader in the syndication of feature films to TV. He was instrumental in the preparation of such films as "Lolita," "The Misfits," "Object" and "Whatever Happened to Baby Jane," among others.

Prior to joining Seven Arts, Stillman served as general counsel and film executive for numerous picture and television companies, including the late Michael Todd's "Around the World in 80 Days." He was president of Maxine Productions, the company which produced "Maxine Rouge" and "Moby Dick," and also served as counsel for the Mirisch Company and Harrisdale Productions.

His wife, son, brother and two sisters survive.

LEON PEARSON

Leon Pearson, 63, NBC's "critic-at-large," died April 29 in New York. For the last decade, Pearson was NBC's "man on the aisle," reviewing Broadway and off-Broadway shows. Usually, his review was the first to reach the public. Following the opening performance, he would quickly walk to the nearest telephone and, without the benefit of any written copy, review the show. His remarks were recorded for broadcast on the next news program.

Pearson joined NBC News in 1947 after a news career that dated back to the 1920's when he helped produce a radio broadcast for Washington columnist Drew Pearson, who was his brother.

Pearson syndicated his own newspaper column on Latin-American affairs called, "Below the Rio Grande." This led to a radio program devoted to news from south of the border and, in time, convinced him to concentrate on broadcasting exclusively.

As a staffer for International News Service from 1943 to 1947, Pearson covered the State Department, later the INS bureau in Paris. His work won him the Legion of Honor, awarded in 1947 by French Foreign Minister Georges Bidault in recognition of Pearson's "objective reporting." He was one of three newsmen admitted to Moscow for the Big Three meeting in December, 1945. After joining NBC News, Pearson covered the Berlin airlift, the United Nations General Assembly in Paris in 1948, later U.N. meetings at Lake Success. During the recent 114-day N.Y. newspaper strike, Pearson appeared frequently on new and/or expanded news programs with his reviews and news of the theatre.

His wife and three sons also survive.

ROLAND PERTWEE

Roland Pertwee, 78, playwright, screenwriter and novelist, died April 26 in London.

He began writing in 1914 and among his novels are "Rivers to Cross," "Eagle and the Wren," "Our Wonderful Selves" and "Treasure Trails." His play, "Interference," a collaboration with Dr. Harold Dearden, ran six months in the West End and in 1927 opened to favorable reviews on Broadway. He also wrote "I Serve," "Hell's Loose," "Heat Wave," "Pursuit" and "A Prince of Romance."

In 1931, he signed a contract with Warner Brothers to write scenarios. He wrote such films as "Road to Singapore," "Nonstop New York," "Jeannie," "Young Man's Fancy," "They Were Sisters," "Madonna of Seven Moons" and "Caravan." The film version of his play, "Pink String and Sealing Wax," was made in 1950.

BERTRAM PEACOCK

Bertram Peacock, 70, who portrayed Franz Schubert in the original edition of Sigmund Romberg's "Blossom Time," died April 20 in New York. He was active in Gilbert & Sullivan operettas and more recently was a vocal teacher.

Born in Philadelphia, Peacock was a church singer before turning to the stage. One of his major roles was his depiction of Charon in "Rosenbaum on the Styx" in 1928. He also sang with the St. Louis Municipal Opera, Century Grand Opera Co. and Chicago Civic Opera. He once was a music aide of the late S. L. (Roxy) Rothafel who produced shows at the Roxy Theatre and Radio City Music Hall, N.Y.

Survived by wife.

MILDRED McCARTY

Mildred McCarty, 51, head of the New York public relations association bearing his name was found dead early Friday (28) morning in a wooded area of Staten Island with a 12-gauge shotgun near him. He had a gunshot wound in his head.

Mildred, operating side by side the late Steve Hannagan, whom he helped publicize Miami Beach and Sun Valley had his own p.r. firm at 2500 Park Ave. and resided at 220 East 60th St., New York. His associates in New Yorker circles, was treasury press chief of the National War Bond campaign early in World War II, and also a Marine combat correspondent during the war, and rose to the rank of major.

A son by his divorced wife, the former Eleanor de Forest White, and a sister survive.

ANTHONY A. BEY

Anthony A. Bey, 61, father of Anthony M. Bey, v.p. and general manager of the Hotel Astor, New York, died April 26. Besides his widow, another son, Charles Bey, who followed in the family footsteps of catering and is now food director of Maritime College, Ft. Schuyler, Bronx, N. Y., survive.

Anthony A. Bey joined the Hotel Astor, which his son now heads, when this famed Times Sq. landmark opened in 1904, as manager of the famous L'Orangerie Restaurant (adjacent to the Hunt Room) and remained until 1918. He was hired by W. C. Muenchenheim, the Astor's original owner. (It's now a Webb & Knapp-Zeckendorf Hotels operation, having gone through several hands, from the Sheraton chain to a syndication refinancing).

The deceased's Bey-Mangin Caterer is where the present Tony Bey got his training after school hours, eventually going to the Waldorf-Astoria as manager before shifting to the Astor.

The elder Bey became manager of the Woodstock Hotel, near-Times Sq. hostelry, in 1927, was associated with the Bermuda Base Contractors during the war years, managed the Chicken Coop restaurant in Boston and the Union League Club in N. Y. He retired in 1946 following an accident. Bey Sr. was a charter member and a 35-year member of the Geneva Intl. Assn., the restaurateur's body.

JOHN BLEECK

John Bleeck, 69, former operator of New York's Artist & Writers Restaurant, familiarly known to many newspapermen, died April 23 in Manhasset, L. I.

Bleeck's originally a speakeasy, for years was one of the few all-male hangouts in the drinking belt. The only female allowed on the premises was Minnie the Cat and customers had to disport themselves within great decorum, or would otherwise be made unwelcome.

Although located in the area of the N. Y. Herald Tribune and the N. Y. Times, Bleeck's was patronized by newspapermen from most sheets and writers from many magazines. In 1933, Bleeck sold the saloon to Thomas J. Fitzpatrick, a brewing company exec.

Survived by his wife.

CHRISTOPHER HASSALL

Christopher Hassall, 51, actor, author and poet, collapsed on a train and died April 23 in Chatham, Eng. He made his first stage appearance in "The Oxford Bleeders" in 1932, and subsequently was the late Ivor Novello's understudy. He also toured Australia with Nicholas Hannen's company.

Hassall adapted "Quality Street," by Sir James Barrie, as a musical, and wrote the libretto of "Troilus and Cressida" as an opera, with music by William Walton. He was best known in the theatre as a lyricist, writing the lyrics for most of Novello's shows, from "Glamorous Night" to "King's Rhapsody."

RUDOLPH STERNAD

Rudolph Sternad, 57, longtime production designer, died of a [illegible] April 21 in Knoxville, Tenn. He had been an art director [illegible], when he joined Metro. He later was with William Fox, United Artists, Universal, Columbia and most recent, Stanley Kramer.

Among his best-known credits were Kramer's "On the Beach" and "Inherit the Wind"; 20th's "Old Chicago," "Hunt"; Columbia's "The More the Merrier," "Talk of the Town," "Craig's Wife" and "You Were Never Lovlier."

His wife survives.

CECIL ACKERY

Cecil Ackery, 78, whose career as a vaude magician [illegible] World War I when he entertained British army troops, died April 8 in Vancouver, B.C., shortly after performing in a benefit show. He suffered a heart attack while waiting for a curtain call bow-bow and died enroute to a hospital.

A member of the Vancouver Magic Circle, Ackery came to Canada in 1907 after touring the world as a magician. His specialty was [illegible] he is believed.

Despite Negative Comment, Paris Season's Quota of Hits Not Bad

By GENE MOSKOWITZ

Paris, April 30.

Though still moaning about rising production costs, taxation, too many theatres and unstable attendance, Parisian legit must admit this season to have been one of the better ones since the war as far as the number of hits. Another plus factor was that two of the 10 hits were musicals. Interestingly, two of the top 10 were adaptations of U. S. plays via Bernhard Sud Grady's version of "Sunday in New York" (Un Dimanche a New York) by Norman Krasna and Pat Quentin's adaptation of Henry Denker's Freud play "The Far Country" as "Le Fil Rouge" (The Red Thread). Former is at the Palais Royal and other at the Gymnase.

The sprightly playing of Jean-Claude Brialy and Marie-Jose Nat were the main factors for the hit of the Krasna opus, plus breezy production, while Curt Jurgens' limning of Freud was also lauded as well as the fine melodramatic envelope of the play. Both look to easily spill well into next season.

Robert Dhery's "La Grosse Valse" (The Big Valse), by Dhery and Gerard Calvi, at the Varietes, mixes song, dance, gags and a bow to old French music hall production numbers, with a bit of plotting, to make a risible, eyecatching show that is doing mock biz and should also be around next season.

Comics Jean-Marc Thibault and Roger Pierre brought off a verve musical "Les Plumes Rouges" (The Red Feathers) at the cutsie Alhambra which has stayed all season after being penciled in for a month. A take off on rock singers, it has a simple book and obvious numbers but is inventive and good natured and a step forward in regular tuners here.

"La Bonne Planque" (The Good Hideout) by Michel Andre is mainly a vehicle for comic Bourvil and is in for the season at the Nou-

Theatre in Mayfair Hotel; Bell From Cobham Stages Pirandello's 'Characters'

London, April 30.

The new May Fair Theatre, the latest development of the May Fair Hotel operated by the Danziger brothers (Edward J and Harry Lee), is to be formally opened on June 6, and the inaugural production will be Pirandello's "Six Characters in Search of an Author." William Ball, who directed the version now current at the Martinique Theatre, off Broadway, is coming to London to stage the presentation at the May Fair.

First performance at the new theatre will be on May 20, when the invitees will be the workmen who have built the theatre, and their families. For the subsequent week, there will be a series of charity shows and, in all cases, the Danzigers have given the theatre to the charities concerned.

The May Fair, which will have 300 seats, with a clearance of one foot between each row, will operate a dual price policy of $2.80 and $8.36. The auditorium will be air-conditioned by refrigeration, and it is claimed to be the first London house employing that process. One unique feature of the development is the inclusion of a videotape gallery, via which any performance can be taped, with full audience participation.

Initially, it is proposed to have one evening performance, starting at 7:30, but at a later date the management will probably start a second show, starting at 10:30 p.m. In that event, the two shows will alternate, with one running one week at 7:30 and the next at the later hour.

Barbara Barrie to Flint

Barbara Barrie will appear in a production of "The Taming of the Shrew" next Wednesday-Saturday (8-11) at the F. A. Bower Theatre of Flint (Mich.) Junior College.

Arrangements for her to appear in the college presentation were made by the Guest Artists Service of the American National Theatre & Academy.

Husbandly Advice

London, April 30.

Manager Walter Johel has enlarged on the reasons why his wife Carol Ann Ford withdrew from the upcoming stage musical version of "The Sleeping Prince" because its story her real intentions might be misinterpreted.

He claims that the two year exclusive contract offered her would have curtailed her career because she found, on reading the script, that she had two small scenes in the show amounting to a total exposure of eight or nine minutes only. "And," adds Johel "nine minutes which she could do little with to help project herself."

Clinic on Trade Problems of Auds

Management problems will be the theme of the convention and trade exhibit to be held July 29-31 at the King Edward Sheraton Hotel, Toronto, by the International Assn. of Auditorium Managers. New this year will be the presentation of the Charles A. McElravy Award to the manager who makes the outstanding contribution to the profession and IAAM. A new committee has been established to set up standards for the award.

Another committee has been formed to study an IAAM-sponsored college scholarship, a short court for building managers and a college or university course for building management. Charles R. Byrnes is the association's executive director.

ACTORS-IN-RESIDENCE AN ANN ARBOR ENCORE

Assn. of Producing Artists will return to the Univ. of Michigan, Ann Arbor, as resident company participant in the Professional Theatre Program there for a nine-week Fall Festival from Oct. 7-Dec. 16. A repertory of four productions is to be presented by the APA during that period at the Trueblood Auditorium. The company, which was in residence at the university for the first time this season, will precede its Oct. 7 opening with a five-week rehearsal period and, in addition to the nine weeks of performances at the Trueblood, the troupe will also tour Michigan for two weeks under the university's sponsorship.

Rockefeller Vetoes Bill To Up Model Agent Fee

Albany, April 30.

Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller has vetoed a bill proposed by Assemblyman John Robert Brook, Manhattan Republican, which would have amended Section 185 of the General Business Law, to increase the employment agency fee for engagements in modeling from 10% to 15%. In nixing the measure, he noted that Actors Equity, the Screen Actors Guild, the American Federation of Television & Radio Artists, the State Department of Labor, Mayor Robert F. Wagner of New York City and the State AFL-CIO has recommended "disapproval."

"The Employment Agency Law Article 11 of the General Business Law) has been the subject of piecemeal amendment over many years," Rockefeller said in his veto message. "In consequence it contains differing fee standards. Under the section which would be amended by this bill, for example, an employment agency may charge an actor a 10% fee, a musician 20% and, if this bill were approved, a model 15%. While it may be that such differences have a firm basis in the economics of the employment agency field, further consideration of this measure should await a study which has been undertaken by the Industrial Commissioner."

Pidgeon as 'Pongo'

Hollywood, April 30.

Stan Seiden and Zev Bufman open their summer season at Cocoanut Grove Playhouse, Miami, July 2 with Walter Pidgeon starring in "Lord Pongo," in for two weeks and followed by Ann Sothern in "God Bless Our Bank," which producers will have on national tour.

Other two-week bookings at house include Peggy Cass and Joan Caulfield in pre-Broadway tryout of Harold Prince' production of "She Didn't Say Yes," and Walter Slezak in "Romanoff and Juliet."

If Winner Loses, Runnerup Wins In Play Contest

Town Theatre of Columbia, S.C., is conducting its third annual playwrighting contest under the sponsorship of Columbia's newspapers. Prize money totals $1,500, all of which goes to the winning entry if it's produced by the Town Theatre. If there's no production then the winning selection gets only $500 with the balance of the prize money going to the runnerup. Entries, which must be unpublished full-length plays or musicals, must be submitted to the 46-year-old community theatre by next July 31.

Judging this year's contest will be actor-author Emlyn Williams, film-legit director Delbert Mann and Robert B. Telford, director of the Virginia Museum Theatre in Richmond. Both Mann and Telford are former directors of the Town Theatre.

ST. PAUL CIVIC TOURS INCLUDE MINNEAPOLIS

St. Paul, April 30.

A St. Paul theatrical company may break precedent next year and take one of its stage offerings across the river here to Minneapolis. This local legit "first" will take place if the St. Paul Civic Opera carries out its intention to stage one of its operas in Minneapolis' new Tyrone Guthrie theatre.

In past years the adjoining Twin Cities have frequently balked at sharing their respective legit attractions although during the past two seasons most Theatre Guild entries played both cities which sponsored separate subscription series.

Civic Opera, which last week completed its 20th season with "Unsinkable Molly Brown," will produce three musical comedies and two operas in 1963-64. Since the Guthrie theatre has a limited seating capacity of 1,400, the St. Paul company won't export one of its musicals but will send over one of its two operas. In addition, Glenn Jordan, the company's managing director, is planning to tour at least one of his upcoming entries nearby Midwestern states.

"Molly" took better than $40,000, nearing the company's previous $44,500 high for "Oklahoma!" and last season's $43,000 for "Carousel."

Steve Douglass Hobbles Through St. Paul Tuner

St. Paul, April 30.

Actor Stephen Douglass was partially crippled opening night of the St. Paul Civic Opera's production of the Meredith Willson's "Unsinkable Molly Brown." He had been struck in the leg by a prop chair during dress rehearsal six hours before performance.

Director Glenn Jordan lopped two roughhousing and dancing scenes involving Douglass and Dorothy Collins who played "Molly" from the opener. Actor employed a cane through show's second act to ease the pressure on his pin.

Don't Muff Her Cues

Gordon Connell and his wife, Jane Connell, will be working together in the off-Broadway production of "Put It In Writing," but on opposite side of the footlights. Connell, who's musical director for the production, will be in the orchestra pit playing lead piano.

His wife will be on stage as one of the performers in the revue which opens May 13 at the Theatre de Lys, N.Y.

Russian Roulette

Paris, April 30.

The Paris Opera has cancelled previously scheduled appearances by Ivan Petrov and Galina Wychnevskaya, Soviet singers.

Unannounced background is that the Soviets asked the Opera House to cancel a scheduled performance by Rudolf Nureyev, saying that if Nureyev danced there, the Soviets would cancel performances of the Soviet singers. George Auric, head of the Opera, replied by cancelling all three, explaining to "inside" friends: "No arguments, no blackmail."

Stan Young New ANTA Exec Dir.

Stanley Young takes over today (Wed.) as executive director of the American National Theatre & Academy. He assumes the post vacated last June by Willard Swire and which has been filled on a temporary basis since then by Flora Martel who's now become associate executive director.

Young, who's been associated with ANTA as a member of the organization's board of directors and as vice-president of the Greater N.Y. Chapter, is an author and playwright. He's been represented on Broadway in past by four productions, the last of which was "Mr. Pickwick" in 1953. His last professional outing in legit was as author of "Lauretta," which folded during its out-of-town tryout in 1956.

BRITISH DOINGS SET FOR 'FUNNY THING'

London, April 30.

Five British comedians have been hired for "A Funny Thing Happened On The Way to The Forum," for which rehearsals will start in August. Plus Frankie Howard in the Zero Mostel role, Kenneth Connor, Jon Pertwee, Robertson Hare and Eddie Gray have enlisted for the caper. Sally Smith plays the femme lead, the virgin Philia and Linda Gray is cast as Domina.

George Abbott will stage the comedy which is being presented by Harold Prince, in association with Tony Walton and Richard Pilbrow.

Barrault to Stage His First Opera, 'Wozzek'

Paris, April 30.

Jean-Louis Barrault has agreed to stage the forthcoming production of "Wozzek," Alban Berg opera, at the Paris Opera, next November. Arrangements were made via lend-lease of the two-State-operated theatres, Barrault's Theatre de France and the Opera, in line with the new program promulgated by Andre Malraux, Minister of Culture. It will be Barrault's first tilt with opera.

Musical end and orchestra direction will be handled by Pierre Boulez, Barrault's former musical director, who also will be making his Paris Opera debut.

SEVERED PARTNERSHIP

Frank Goodman, Ben Washer Go Separate Ways

Broadway legit pressagents Frank Goodman and Ben Washer will dissolve their partnership May 11. Their present accounts include the Broadway productions of "No Strings," "Photo Finish," "Sound of Music" and "Tchin-Tchin," as well as the Danny Kaye show at the Ziegfeld Theatre N.Y., and the Plaza-9 operation at the Hotel Plaza, N.Y.

Goodman will retain the present office and all the accounts but the Plaza, which Washer, who's moving to new quarters, will continue to represent.

Merrick Apologizes for 'Tonight'; Times' Still Resents 'Public Offense'

By ROBT MORRISON

In the wake of his recent appearance on the "Tonight" television show, David Merrick has apparently ended his perennial critic-baiting campaign. It remains to be seen, of course, how completely or for how long the producer can stifle his irritation over the reviews of his future Broadway shows. In the meanwhile, however, he has stirred up, among other things, a small dust storm among the membership of the N. Y. Drama Critics Circle.

Following the advance-ballyhooed stint on the "Tonight" show and the volley of unfavorable comment it brought, Merrick apparently made an agonizing reappraisal of his whole anti-critic policy, and decided to drop it. First, of his own accord, he wrote an apology to Howard Taubman, critic of the N. Y Times and long the principal target of his public attacks. The aisle-sitter acknowledged it with a one-sentence note, and neither he nor the producer divulged the exact texts of the two messages.

It was evident that Taubman was not mollified by the apology, and that Merrick isn't concerned over that fact. The producer indicated to friends that his apology was inspired by his own attitude toward the television appearance and that his opinion of Taubman hasn't changed. He explained: 'The tv thing was intended to be a sort of satirical ribbing, and no more to be taken seriously than that libelous 'Abominable Showman' flippancy that several people have used to kid me."

As innumerable public figures have observed in the past, Merrick has decided that it's futile to engage in controversy with the press, which always "has the last word." He thought that television offered a way to battle the critics on an even basis, the producer asserted, adding, "But I got carried away. The situation on the 'Tonight' show got out of hand and ugly.

"I subsequently decided it had been undignified and that I'd done Taubman an injustice, so I wrote him an apology. I think perhaps

Williamson Projects: Marceau Clicks, Borge Back, Dicker Jack Benny

Melbourne, April 30.

J. C. Williamson Theatres Ltd. is busy readying Noel Coward's "Sail Away" to open here on May 24 with Coward himself due here to supervise final rehearsals. Currently staging is in the hands of John Hewer, who played the Purser in the West End production and will be remembered in the New York production of "The Boy Friend." Aussie star Maggie Fitzgibbon returns to her home town to play the lead and will be backed by an Aussie cast of Kevin Colson, Diana Bell, Jon Dennis, Letty Craydon and Alton Harvey.

Marcel Marceau (presented in association with Aztec Services) has done well here and is certain to pay a return visit. Victor Borge on opening here again May 6 backed by Leonid Hambro.

"How to Succeed," which opens in Melbourne in August, is to be staged by Freddie Carpenter from London and will have the American actor Jay Gerber as Frump; "Camelot" opens in Sydney in October.

Following Google Withers' success in "Woman in a Dressing Gown," the new Aussie play "Who'll Go A'Waltzing," recently tried out at the St. Martin's Theatre here, will tour the Williamson circuit, possibly with an actress from England taking over the leading role.

In July Irene Handle arrives to star in her West End vehicles "Goodnight Mrs Puffin," and in September Derek Farr and his wife Muriel Pavlow pay a return visit Down Under to tour in "Mary Mary." They were last here in 1959-60 when they extensively toured in "Odd Man In" and "The Gazebo." Another play on the Williamson list is "Never Too Late."

Williamsons are also negotiating separately with Joyce Greenfell and Jack Benny to come Down Under.

Musical numbers: "Good Morning, Good Day," "Nobody Writes Letters," "Thank You, Madam," "Three Cheers Mr.," "No More Candy," "Three Letters," "Twilight at Night," "I Don't Know Her Name," "Perspective," "Grand Knowing You," "Will He Like Me?" "Home," "I Resolve," "A Romantic Atmosphere," "Tango Tragique," "Dear Friend," "Try Me," "Where's My Shop?" "Ice Cream," "She Loves Me," "A Trip to the Library," "Grand Knowing You," "Twelve Days to Christmas."

The Broadway season has finally produced a fresh, expert enjoyable musical show — an American musical, that is. It's called "She Loves Me" and it opened last week at the Eugene O'Neill Theatre as the first homemade song and dance hit of the waning season.

Like so many genuine American articles, "She Loves Me" has a foreign ancestry, deriving from a Hungarian play, "Parfumerie," by Miklos Laszlo, never done on the stage in the U.S., but filmed by Ernst Lubitsch and released by Metro in 1940 as "The Shop Around the Corner." That was a charming picture. If memory serves, and this brightly sentimental musical romance seems hardly less so.

The show, with book by Joe Masteroff, music by Jerry Bock and lyrics by Sheldon Harnick, should be a substantial Broadway hit, a natural for the screen and a patent item for the road and ultimately stock. It looks deceptively simple, for it's an intimate, informal production with a relatively small cast, a single basic revolving set and not elaborate costuming. However, it requires the rare qualities of skill and taste and humor.

As pre-World War II grosers may recall, "The Shop Around the Corner" was a tender, whimsical love story located in a Budapest specialty store, with James Stewart and Margaret Sullavan as the romantic young couple, Frank Morgan as the stern but kindly proprietor and Joseph Schildkraut as the two-timing clerk having an affair with the boss's wife.

This legitimery version remains surprisingly close to the Lubitsch film treatment, especially in the way it captures the gentle, infectious humor and the lightness. The music is developed from and is integrated with the story. There are few big numbers, and the whole show avoids the sort of ramination of a big Broadway song and dance fandango.

The first act is rather quiet as the story slowly gets under way in the shop, with the nice young sales clerk and the new girl not recognizing each other as sweethearts-by-correspondence. The pace and interest pick up in the second act, however, with four successive hit songs, and not even a jammed traveler arrim that brought the show to several minutes' halt could dampen the opening night audience response.

Under Harold Prince's adroit direction, Barbara Cook gives a beguiling performance as the smitten-by-mail heroine, and of course she sings with glowing artistry. Daniel Massey, son of Raymond Massey, is a personable actor and sings well enough as the likable young clerk. Barbara Baxley, third-starred, gives a vivid performance dramatically and sings passably as sales clerk who loves the two-timer not wisely.

Jack Cassidy is standout as the lady-killing heel, making a great of an amusingly hammed-up song number near closing. Ludwig Donath is excellent as the paternal shop owner and there are acceptable supporting portrayals by Nathaniel Frey and Ralph Williams.

Carol Haney did the artfully unpretentious musical staging. William and Jean Eckart designed the atmospheric and practical scenery and lighting, and Patricia Zipprodt provided the becoming costumes. The production is presented by Harold Prince, in association with Lawrence N. Kasha and Philip C. McKenna.

"She Loves Me" probably won't cause a boxoffice stampede, but it should do handsomely enough. It's a good show. Hobe.

Off-B'way Reviews

The Good Soldier Schweik

B-M Productions presentation of drama, based on novel by Jaroslav Hasek, adapted and staged by Robert Kalfin; sets and costumes, Gordon Micenzi. Stars Irwin Corey. Opened April 8, '63, at the Cort Theatre, N. Y.; $6.90 top weeknights, $8.50 weekends.

Cast: Irwin Corey, Sheldon Baron, Bruce Kimmer, Marilyn Chris, Connor Mac Agnes, Arlo Frangos, Henry Corey, Conrad Bloch, Bill Lang, Lenka Peterka, Joseph Bovino, Jacques Bishop, Theodor Mishkin, Gilbert Blanc, Paul E. Pounds, Theo Barnes, Barbara Shaw, Jim Broughton.

The saga of a feeble-minded Czech, drafted into the madness of World War I, is told episodically and tediously in "The Good Soldier Schweik," an adaptation of Jaroslav Hasek's novel. In 16 scenes, Sherwik progresses from a peacetime dog thief to a front-line combatant in Franz Josef's army. Along the way he is harassed by an unpleasant assortment of doctors, judges, army officers, police interrogators and an obnoxious whisky-priest, all of whom he outwits with a blend of shrewdness and stupidity.

The production is elaborate, but the play lacks needed sharpness and irony. Broad, unfunny comedy and loud sound effects are substituted for a clear point of view. Though the drama is only two and a quarter hours long, it seems interminable.

Irwin Corey, as Schweik, is likable and occasionally amusing. But his characterization is inconsistent, presenting Sherwik sometimes as a dolt, sometimes as a shrewd operator. The rest of the cast, each of whom essays several roles, is undistinguished.

The opening night program credited Robert Kalfin with the adaptation and staging. But he informed the press prior to curtaintime that he had been dismissed, and that he disclaimed all responsibility.

The Square Root of Wonderful

Equity Library Theatre, Inc., presentation of a play in three acts by Carson McCullers. Staged by Richard Hart; sets and lighting by Simon Wolfe; music composed and scored by Lee Hoiby; production stage manager, Keith Robinson. Opened April 30, '63, at the Master Theatre, N.Y.

Cast: Eleanor Shelton, Jeff Conaway, John Bates, Penny Groves, Mary Hara, Eleanor Cody Gould, George Guird.

Carson McCullers' "Square Root of Wonderful," which ran for 45 performances on Broadway in 1957, is a turgid melodrama, with a few good scenes surrounded by unbelievable, tiresome ones. It's not the fault of the ELT cast that their revival of the play is ineffective.

Eleanor Shelton, as a young mother torn between her selfish ex-husband and a new love, has a warm and attractive stage personality, but she is defeated by the weakness of her role. John Bates as the lover, however, has the play's best lines, and he does well by most of them.

Mary Hara is winning as a spinster, and Eleanor Cody Gould is properly hateful as a meddling mother-in-law. Jeff Conway is acceptable as the young boy. The sets, by Elmon Webb, are fine. But "Square Root of Wonderful" was a poor choice for the ELT Library series. Kenn.

Rev. Marthe's Jubilee

Washington, April 30.

Catholic University Theatre celebrated its 25th anni with a musical revue touching on the old, the upcoming and with contributions from former staffers including Jean and Walter Kerr, Jay Gorney, James Rado, Lee Brady and Edward Cashman.

Producing "Jubilee" is Rev. Gilbert Marthe, O.P., who is also being feted for his 25th year in the Catholic University drama department.

"Jubilee" will play from April 26-May 11.

ANTI-PIUS XII PLAY BOOKED FOR BASLE

Basle, April 30.

The invidiously-regarded German play by Rolf Hochhuth, "Der Stellvertreter" (The Deputy), a current sellout at Berlin's Theater am Kurfuerstendamm where it has been staged by Erwin Piscator, has been set by the Swiss Stadttheatre Basle for production during the 1964-'65 season. The play, which offers the theory that the late Pope Pius XII has failed to take a sufficiently vigorous stand against Nazism, is presently the topic of discussions in legit circles as well as the press all over Europe.

Shortly after disclosure of the planned Basle performance, a request has been filed with the Swiss Federal Council by a religious layman's group from Lucerne asking Swiss government to examine the possibility of banning the playlet as disturber of the peace among the various faiths due to its one-sided, unobjective tendency and alleged falsification of historic facts. No government reaction to this request has been registered so far.

Basle Stadttheatre management, however, has declared its firm intention to resist any pressure from outside to prevent staging the play and, if necessary, to "fight to the bitter end."

Meanwhile, it has been learned that Ingmar Bergman is to direct the Swedish preem of "The Deputy" at Stockholm's Dramaten legithouse next September. The play has reportedly also been set by the Narvic Theatre in Oslo, Norway, whilst the Danish bow will take place in Odense. In all, eight countries so far have acquired performance rights, as per reports by the German publisher Rowohlt, who owns the rights.

Brothers' Comedy Set For N.Y., London Preems

London, April 30.

The next Boulting Brothers' comedy, "Heavens Above," which stars Peter Sellers and features Cecil Parker and Isabel Jeans, is to have a simultaneous N. Y. and London preem. It will open at the Sutton in Manhattan, and the Columbia here on May 20.

"Heavens" produced by Roy and directed by John Boulting, has the same satirical, semi-humorous, semi-serious approach to the Church that previous Boulting pix have dished out to trade unionism, the Foreign Office, the law and the army.

Virtue In Danger

London, April 11.

Mermaid Trust in association with Tennents Productions, presentation of a farcical comedy with music, based on John Vanbrugh's "The Relapse," with book and lyrics by Paul Dehn; music by James Bernard. Staged by Wendy Toye; costumes and décor, Alix Stone; musical direction, Michael Mooree; arrangements, Douglas Gamley. Features John Moffatt, Patricia Routledge, Hermione Baddeley, Sir Ingham, Jane Wenham, Gwen Nelson, Alan Howard, Richard Wordsworth, Patsy Byrne, Basil Hoskins. Opened April 10, '63, at the Mermaid Theatre, London; $3.65 top.

Sir John Friendly ..... Alan Brereton

Musical Numbers: "Don't Call Me Sir!" "Fortune Thou Art a Bitch," "Stand Back Old Sinner!" "I'm In Love With My Husband," "Merry Servants!" "Let's All Together," "Burden With Charms," "Nurse, Nurse, Nurse!" "Who Be I Feel What I Feel" "Fire A Salute!" "Put Him In The Doghouse," "Wait a Little Longer, Lover," "O Take This Ancient Mansion," "Say the Word."

With more work and tightening, "Virtue In Danger" should have a rosy chance of emulating the success at the Mermaid, in the West End and abroad of "Lock Up Your Daughters." Certainly no offering at the Mermaid has been greeted with more first-night enthusiasm since "Lock Up." This musical version of Sir John Vanbrugh's Restoration comedy, "The Relapse," opens on a slowish note but gathers momentum and overall has pace, style, wit and sufficient bawdiness.

Paul Dehn, who wrote book and lyrics, has had to telescope the comedy somewhat to accommodate his 14 songs, but has kept a considerable amount of Vanbrugh dialog, and his own bits snugly into the style of the Restoration period. He has also scribed neat duet, witty lyrics and, in a program note, points out how irresistible some of Vanbrugh's lines are as cues for song and as titles.

James Bernard's rather genteel and hobby music is not particularly distinguished but it blends happily enough with Dehn's words and benefits from harmonious work by an unseen orch.

Production numbers that score are "Fire A Salute!" which brings the first stanza to a lively close, "Don't Call Me Sir!" in which John Moffat as Lord Foppington sets the mood of the piece at the outset, and "Put Him In The Doghouse," though an unnecessarily coarse verse could well be tossed away. The ramifications of the plot and counterplot are too complicated for detailing here but Wendy Toye has staged "Virtue" with spirit and a bright sense of comedy in which she gets full assist from a slick energetic all-round cast.

Moffatt, as the foppous Lord Foppington, is not afraid to parody effectively the Restoration farcical style. A big personal success is scored by Patricia Routledge as a very merry, designing young widow with a roving eye and her duet with Worthy, a philanderer (Basil Hoskins) called "Wait a little longer, lover" and a solo by Miss Routledge called "Let's Fall Together," are both standouts in the score.

Though put over lightly rather than as a romantic song a number called "Why Do I Feel What I Feel" sung by Barrie Ingham as the impecunious hero to Patsy Byrne, a fine dumpling of a heroine, emerges as an unexpectedly charming and tender love song. Jane Wenham, a sweet Amanda, Marilyn Benson, Alan Howard, Richard Wordsworth and Gwen Nelson are others who give major assistance.

Scenery, as always at the Mermaid, is of the simplest. But Alix Stone has done an adequate job and his handsome costume designs give richness to a production that is an engaging blend of high comedy, pantomime and farce. It will satisfy the palates of a large number of theatregoers though probably not Restoration period purists who will certainly prefer the original. Rich.

Show Out of Town

Never Too Late

Miami, April 23.

Rev Burbeau and Max Seidel presentation Gilbert Martin and Manuel Mathewson production starring Fred Clark, Joan Bennett in comedy in three acts by Sumner Arthur Long. Directed by George Abbott. Setting by Lee B. Mayer, costumes by Florence Klotz, director's assistant Judith Abbott. "Never Too Late Cha-Cha" by Jerry Bock and Sheldon Harnick. Incidental music by John Kander. Opened 10-day engagement at the Coconut Grove Playhouse, April 22, '63; $6.50 top.

Grace Kimbrough ..... Mary Cooper
Harry Lambert ..... Fred Clark
Edna Lambert ..... Joan Bennett
Mr. James Kimbrough ..... Allen Frank
Charlie ..... Tom Stern
Kate ..... Nancy Donahue
Mr. Foley ..... Wallace Engelhardt
Mayor Crane ..... Matt Crowley
Policeman ..... John Leone

It is a moot question which of its many facets has made Sumner Arthur Long's deft comedy, Credit combination of its "pregnant" theme of middle-aged parenthood, Fred Clark's wizard sense of timing and the magic of George Abbott's direction.

Although the first two acts are merely a series of well-spaced cliches about unscheduled infanticipating, they keep audiences laughing sympathetically at the stars family's discomfiture.

It is the third act, however, that clinches its comedic impact, as both author and director have delivered a great drunk scene. It completely breaks up the house as projected by Clark and Tom Stern who has provided, up to now, the perfect riposter for Clark's thrusts.

Joan Bennett carries off the role of wistful mother-to-be with charm and style. In spite of the fact that she has almost none of the punch lines, by skillful underplaying she manages to hold her own with Clark, no simple task.

The rest of the cast preassembled for export to London is most adequate. Nancy Donahue is attractive and convincing as the married daughter, and polished performances are turned in by Mary Cooper, Allen Frank, Wallace Engelhardt and John Leone.

Unmistakably "made in America," there is a universality in the theme of "Never Too Late." Say that its comedy is as earthy and blunt as a pile-driver. Coles.

Legit Followup

The Premise

(THE PREMISE, N.Y.)

The Premise, an improvisational operation in Greenwich Village, will be two-and-a-half-years-old this month. A week ago Thursday (18), the cast unveiled what it calls "The New Show at the Premise." If that implies the previous offering was the "old" premise, it seems to belie the claim of improvisational performance, as there is presumably a difference between the material of the two editions.

Perhaps the application "new" applies to the rehearsed material being used. Whether or not it's a misnomer for this type of show is of little consequence. What is important is that the group's commentary on modern manners and mores continues to be basically bright, if not at all times satirically satisfying. As usual, current news events provide the basis for audience-suggested improvisations, some of which come off well.

The cast comprises Premise regulars Thomas Alderdge, Joan Darling, Theodore M. Flicker and James Frawley. They work well together, with Miss Darling particularly notable for her effective handling of all the femme assignments. Some of the prepared material is good, but, as with the improvised bits, not everything hits the target.

Flicker is director and producer of the group, in association with Dryid W. Carter and Allan M. Mankoff. Jess.

The Swan Theatre, Milwaukee, has extended its presentation of "Can-Can," starring Monique Van Vooren an additional week through next Sunday (5).

'Camelot' $84,629, 'Take' $29,732, L.A.; 'Milk' $37,561, D.C.; Tallu 18½G, Bost.; 'World' $42,675, 'Oh Dad' $26,631, Chi

The Coast is back in the bigger grosser groove with the Civic Light Opera Assn. seasons now in operation in Los Angeles and San Francisco. "Camelot," playing CLO time in L.A. registered the top take for the stanza, while "Carousel," the CLO entry in Frisco, also did well.

Other hot b.o. entries included "How to Succeed in Business Without Really Trying" in Detroit and "Sound of Music" in Philadelphia.

Estimates for Last Week

Parenthetic designations for out-of-town shows are the same as for Broadway, except that hyphenated T with show classification indicates tryout, RS indicates road show and BT indicates bus-and-truck production. Also, prices on touring shows include 10% Federal tax and local tax, if any, but as on Broadway grosses are net; i.e., exclusive of taxes. Engagements are for single week unless otherwise noted.

Where subscription is mentioned, the gross is the net after the deductions of commissions. Grosses for split weeks are projected when shows play guaranteed dates.

MAD OVER BALLYHOO

London Legits Lean to Hyperbolic Angles

London, April 30.

Gimmicked ballyhoo for West End legit shows grows. "The Mousetrap" is still billed at the Ambassadors as "The 11th Extraordinary Year." "My Fair Lady," at the appropriate time, was heralded at Drury Lane as in its "Last Two Years."

Now, a striking full page ad in the London Evening Standard boosts four current, newish West End shows with the tag, "Last 11 Years." Banner headlines cheekily announced: "The Home Secretary won't let you see Lenny Bruce but (at the moment) he has no objection to you seeing one of the season's Four Smash Hits!"

The four "smash hits" concerned, in three of which Michael Codron has an active interest and William Donaldson in two, are "An Evening of British Rubbish" at the Comedy, "Next Time I'll Sing To You" (Criterion), "Rattle of a Simple Man" (Garrick) and "The Bed Sitting Room" (Duke of York's).

Nicholas Luard, big wheel of The Establishment Club, which ran into problems over Bruce's appearance, assured VARIETY: "This Lenny Bruce reference is a bonus for us. It was not done by arrangement with Codron."

Peggy Cass will appear in "She Didn't Say Yes," which is to be given a pre-Broadway stock tryout this summer.

Jason Robards Jr. is to play the leading role in "After the Fall," the Arthur Miller play which the Lincoln Center Repertory Co. intends producing as its initial offering next October in a temporary steel structure to be erected in Greenwich Village.

"The Twelve Dancing Princesses," a new children's musical by William Whiting and R. K. Bloomer with choreography by Andre Eglevsky, is to be presented next Friday-Sunday (3-5) and May 11-12 at the Berner School, Massapequa, L.I., N.Y.

Cast changes in the off-Broadway production of "The Importance of Being Earnest" include the takeover by John Mastrelli, Bruce Gould and Joan Hackett of the roles previously played by Louis Edmonds, Ann Shoemaker and Carrie Nye, respectively.

Archibald MacLeish, poet, playwright and three-time winner of the Pulitzer Prize, will deliver the address today (Wed.) at Queens College, Flushing, N.Y., for the 1963 John Golden Award of $1,000 to be presented to a student at the college who, in the opinion of the prize committee, has shown the greatest literary promise in the field of drama, fiction or poetry.

Additional casting for the Actors Equity Golden Anniversary show at the Majestic Theatre, N.Y., next Sunday night (5), includes David Wayne, Paul Ford and John Forsythe, members of the original cast of "The Teahouse of the August Moon," who'll recreate a scene from that comedy; Sam Levene and Vivian Blaine in the "Sue Me" number which they originated in "Guys and Dolls," and Sally Ann Howes singing "I Could Have Danced All Night" from "My Fair Lady," in which she succeeded Julie Andrews on Broadway.

The off-Broadway production of "The Saving Grace" at the Writers' Stage Theatre, not to be outdone by the Broadway production of "Enter Laughing" which is selling second balcony seats at 50c, has reduced the price of 30 of its seats to 50c at each performance.

Katharine Cornell was guest of honor at the recent semi-annual get-together of Broadway's femme boxoffice treasurers at Delmonico's Restaurant, N. Y. The affair was also attended by a flock of name performers.

William Wilson, presently working in New York with legit press-agent Max Eisen, leaves early in June for his ninth season as manager of the Carter Barron Amphitheatre, Washington.

After six years of Saturday afternoon performances at the Cricket Theatre, N. Y., Blanche Marvin's Merri-Mimes is to be incorporated as a non-profit operation under the sponsorship of Helen Menken, Hal March, Julia Meade, Willard Swire, Mr. and Mrs. Elliot Nugent, Lucille Lortel and 16 other individuals. The current Merri-Mimes offering at the Cricket is "The Sleeping Beauty."

British writer Lionel Bart, currently represented on Broadway as author of the book, music and lyrics for "Oliver," planed back to London yesterday (Tues.) after a quickie visit to attend the Tony Awards Dinner at the Americana Hotel, N. Y., last Sunday (28).

Lois Berman, assistant to literary agent Leah Salisbury, is on a six week business-vacation trip to the Far East with her husband, Dave Berman.

The Bil and Cora Baird Marionette Co., which recently concluded an Easter holiday engagement on Broadway, will embark June 10 on a nine-week State Dept.-sponsored tour of the Soviet Union.

Ronald Rogers, just back from an eight-week tour of England, will appear in "DuBarry Was a Lady," opening May 8 at the Meadowbrook Dinner Theatre, Cedar Grove, N. J.

Three one-act plays will be performed on weekends at N. Y. International Airport by the Idlewild Players, which begins its fifth season there May 10. Matt Climber will function as production advisor.

B'way Sags, But 'Hot Spot' $68,180, 'Loves Me' $40,638, 'Photo' $33,320; 'Courage' $29,672, 'Too True' $25,161

Business tumbled for most Broadway shows last week. The drops were generally substantial, going as high as $12,706 for one musical. Holding at capacity were "Beyond the Fringe," "How to Succeed in Business Without Really Trying," "Never Too Late" and "Oliver." Receipts are expected to decline again this week.

There were no closings or openings last week.

CODRON SETS 'SING' FOR N.Y. WITH COHEN

London, April 30.

Michael Codron, who has just returned from New York, where he attended the Broadway launching of "Rattle of a Simple Man," has closed a deal with Alexander H. Cohen to present his current Criterion hit, "Next Time I'll Sing to You," on Broadway, where it is likely to open during the week of Oct. 1.

The play, written by James Saunders, will be reproduced in America by its original director, Shirley Butler, and will be presented with an all-British cast. It will continue its London run.

Elitch's Reopens June 17

Denver, April 30.

Mala Powers and Whitfield Connor are to play the leads in the first three productions when Elitch Gardens Theatre opens its 73d season June 17. Joe E. Brown will star in "Harvey" from Aug. 12 to 31 at the summer park theatre.

The three plays in which Connor and Miss Powers appear are "There's Always Juliet," "The Moon Is Blue" and "Sabrina Fair." Jack Gurtler, manager, reveals that two current Broadway plays, "Harold" and "Riot Act," along with four revivals, will complete the 1963 season.

John Holden, who directed last season's plays at Elitch's is returning this year.

It's Edward Albee's Big Year

Playwright Scores Double on 'Virginia Woolf'—Vivien Leigh, Anna Quayle Nab Tonys

By JESSE GROSS

Edward Albee is running away with this season's playwriting honors for his initial Broadway effort, "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?" During the last week, the play has copped the N. Y. Drama Critics Circle citation and a Tony Award. The lengthy three-acter is also regarded as a contender for the Pulitzer Prize in drama, to be disclosed next Monday (6).

The musical winner in the Tony competition for the year ended last March 31 was "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum." In an unusual occurrence, a majority of the New York aisle-sitters were against voting for a best musical at their meeting last Thursday (25). A foreign selection was also ignored by the critics.

A rule change in effect for the first time this season, requires that the initial vote by the reviewers be for the best play, regardless of origin, and that if the vote is for an American play a second optional ballot can be taken for the best imported play.

"Woolf" got nine votes out of a total of 17 cast at the Circle session. Three of those ballots were proxies. "Mother Courage and Her Children" was the second choice with three votes and "Hollow Crown" ranked third with two votes. Receiving one vote each were "The Milk Train Doesn't Stop Here Anymore," "Tchin-Tchin" and "Photo Finish."

Accoladed with a special citation from the critics was the revue, "Beyond the Fringe." A special Tony award was also given to that British import's four-man company, Alan Bennett, Peter Cook, Jonathan Miller and Dudley Moore, "for their brilliance which has shattered all the old conceptions of comedy." Other special awards were given to Irving Berlin for his longtime "distinguished contribution to musical theatre" and to W. McNeil Lowry, in behalf of the Ford Foundation, "for distinguished support of American theatre."

17th Annual Tonys

The Tony medallions were awarded last Sunday night (28) in the Imperial Ballroom of the Americana Hotel, N. Y., with the proceedings telecast by WOR-TV. It was the 17th annual presentation of the awards for "distinguished contributions to the theatre" by the American Theatre Wing in honor of its founder, the late Antoinette Perry. Besides the special awards to Berlin, Lowry and the "Fringe" company, citations were made in a total of 21 categories.

"Woolf," currently in its 30th week at the Billy Rose Theatre, N. Y., accounted for five awards. Besides winning in the play category, its costars Uta Hagen and Arthur Hill were each cited for their performances. Tony awards also went to Alan Schneider for his direction of the play and to Richard Barr and Clinton Wilder for producing it.

"Forum," currently in its 53d week at the Alvin Theatre, N. Y., accounted for six awards, including its citation as the top musical. Medallions were presented to the show's star, Zero Mostel; director, George Abbott; authors, Burt Shevelove and Larry Gelbart; featured actor, David Burns, and producer Harold Prince.

English Take 'Em

Vivien Leigh was the Tony-winner in the femme musical star category for her performance in "Tovarich" and Anna Quayle got the nod as featured femme in a musical for her performance in "Stop the World—I Want to Get Off." The Misses Leigh and Quayle were among six English winners, exclusive of the "Fringe" company. The other Britishers cited were Lionel Bart, composer-lyricist of "Oliver," Sean Kenny, the musical's set designer, and Donald Pippin, the musical director-conductor for the show. Also, Anthony Powell, costume designer for "The School for Scandal."

Getting Tony awards for featured straight play performances were Alan Arkin for the performance in which he was elevated to costar billing in "Enter Laughing" and Sandy Dennis for her portrayal in the recently-closed "A Thousand Clowns." Bob Fosse won a Tony for his "Little Me" choreography and Solly Pernik was saluted for his work as stage technician for "Mr. President."

A nominating committee consisting of N. Y. Daily News drama critic John Chapman, producer Jean Dalrymple, playwright-producer-director Sidney Kingsley, N. Y. World-Telegram and Sun drama critic Norman Nadel, and N. Y. Post drama critic Richard Watts Jr. assembled a ballot which was mailed to the more than 800 members of the American Theatre Wing. The votes were then tabulated by the theatrical accounting firm of Lutz and Carr.

The awarding of medallions to a play producer and musical producer, as well as a play and musical seems to be somewhat of a duplication as evidenced by the awards to "Woolf," "Forum" and their respective producers. Music for the Tony awards ceremony and dinner was provided by Meyer Davis and his orchestra.

These Are Our Kids

Professional Children's School, N.Y., is currently widely represented by students and alumni in two legit presentations, the Broadway production of "Oliver" and the off-Broadway revival of "Best Foot Forward." PCS sixth-grader Paul O'Keefe is now playing the title role in "Oliver," having taken over that assignment from Bruce Prochnik who's returned to England. Seven other PSCers are also in that musical.

Among the performers in "Foot" are four PCS students and three alumni. In the area of dance, four PCS high school students joined the N.Y. City Ballet's permanent company this spring. Other students have been making appearances in the longhair league and the Maligmat(?) Brothers, who entered the fourth, seventh and 11th grades at PCS last fall, are currently represented on the Scepter label by their recording as the Rocky Flyers of "Killer Jo."

Incidentally, the PCS Commencement program will be held the morning of June [illegible] at Hunter College (N.Y.) Assembly Hall.

A German-language presentation of "Dear Liar," costarring Elisabeth Bergner and O. E. Hasse, opens a week's run at the Barbizon Plaza Theatre, N.Y., next Friday (3).

Opera Review

Midsummer Night's Dream

Opera in three acts by Benjamin Britten, libretto by Britten and Peter Pears. Produced by the N.Y. City Opera. Staged by William Ball; conducted by Julius Rudel; scenery and costumes by Robert Fletcher; Boys Choir from [illegible] Church; lighting, Jules Fisher. Premiere April 25, '63, at N.Y. City Center. Boxoffice scale, $[illegible]; regular, $[illegible].

Oberon	William McDonald (debut)
Tytania	Nadja Witkowska
Puck	Julian Miller (debut)
Theseus, Duke of Athens	Arnold Voketaitis
Hippolyta	Tatiana Troyanos (debut)
Lysander	Charles Hindsley (debut)
Demetrius	David Clatworthy
Hermia	Marlene Kleinman
Helena	Marguerite Willauer
Bottom	Spiro Malas
Quince	John Fiorito
Flute	Richard Krause
Snug	Richard Wentworth
Snout	Howard Fried
Starveling	David Smith

Fantasy, farce and fairies combined as opera might seem an improbable melange. Actually "Midsummer's Night Dream" is skirting the abyss of boredom in Act I, so that it emphasizes the artistry of the enterprise that by the third act curtain one consents to acknowledge a heroic achievement. Naturally the Benjamin Britten score deserves the first salute. Though shy of melody it is adroit in carrying out its story-line purposes. It follows that libretto, a joint job of Britten and Peter Pears, has what it takes to complete a seemingly, at the outset, impossible trip.

The farce has 400-year roots in Shakespeare and it is a mark of this production that it is always under restraint and finally in the masque interlude quite amusing even to a modern audience. This reviewer is disposed to credit the producer, Julius Rudel, and the stager, William Ball, for the tight rein that keeps slapstick within bounds. Actors generally could not be trusted. The shenanigans in the forest and in the palace in many a version of "Midsummer" make any bright five-year-old yawn.

How then account for the quality of this production, one work among seven in a three-week spring repertory of contemporary operas? The figures in the Pantheon read, after Britten, Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund, Rudel, Ball, designer Robert Fletcher, makeup wizard Michael Arshansky, and Julian Miller as Puck. You can't win the hockey game without a spirited, bouncy, acrobatic Puck, and Miller is effective both as a gymnast and as a rhetorician.

The Rockefeller money gave designer Fletcher more freedom with the forest and court settings than this sidestreet opera troupe usually enjoys. The whole thing is artfully contrived and costumed. The getup of Oberon, King of the Fairies, is worthy of a prize and in this Arshansky shares. The role was entrusted to a counter-tenor, William McDonald. His high but sweet voice took some getting used to, but in the end he proved shrewd casting.

Marguerite Willauer is beguiling as Helena, the demure and Marlene Kleinman makes a positive Hermia. Another handsome figure and voice is Tatiana Troyanos (one of four debuts) as betrothed of the Duke of Athens. At this house the parade of new talent is always notable.

Cast is commendable for team play. Spiro Malas (Bottom) heads the amateur actors whose slapstick is the crux of the otherwise anticlimatic third act. John Fiorito, Richard Krause, Richard Wentworth, Howard Fried and David Smith all show sound singing, as required, and a knack for horseplay.

There is general distinction in the production and to the individual roles. Nadja Witkowska is a well-sung Fairy Queen, Arnold Voketaitis a dignified duke.

Only three performances of this work are presently scheduled. It is a nice question whether more will be required. The charm of the story is elusive for those who recall the film and ballet versions. But this is surely a success d'estime for Rudel & Co. Land.

Merrick Apologizes for 'Tonight'

I've become a captive of my own stormy petrel image, and that hereafter I should stick to producing shows and let other people do the public performing."

Taubman made a statement last Monday (29), with the approval of the Times management, that Merrick's letter was, "A private apology for a very public offense. We have no intention of making the apology public. It seems to us that the burden of doing so is on the man who committed the offense." NBC, which airs the "Tonight" series, has not invited Taubman to appear on the show and plans no further action on the matter.

Although the Times reviewer had been reported as telling friends that he might take legal action against Merrick, he answered curtly, "No comment," when asked about the matter at last week's Critics Circle meeting, after informing the members present that he had received an apology from the producer. Taubman was apparently still angry over the affair, according to the other critics.

As presiding officer of the meeting, he not only refused flatly to consider a vote for the best foreign play of the Broadway season (after "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?" had been picked as the best play), but brushed off a suggestion of having a cocktail party or luncheon to make the award in a ceremony for tv or radio coverage. "To hell with it—they've had enough," he said, presumably referring to producers in general. He then abruptly adjourned the meeting.

Taubman, who stepped up from vice-presidency of the Circle to become president upon the death some months ago of Tom Wenning, is due for re-election at the organization's regular meeting next October. Under regular custom, Circle presidents are continued in office for a second term, after which the vice-president is elected to the position. No one was named to the v.p. spot when Taubman moved up to the presidency.

Travis Selmier Booking New Butler Univ. Stand

Indianapolis, April 30.

W. Travis Selmier has been appointed manager of the 2,200-seat Clowes Memorial Hall which is slated to open here next October on the Butler Univ. campus. Selmier, who has already begun lining up bookings for the $3,500,000 theatre for the performing arts, has been a producer here for Intro Productions and for Crosley Broadcasting Co.'s Channel 13. He was also producer for the Indiana Festival Music Theatre, Ft. Wayne.

A national consulation committee for the Hall includes Helen Hayes, Artur Rubinstein, Agnes de Mille, Maurice Evans and George Balanchine.

BEYOND DRILL SHED

Pasadena Playhouse Scholarship For Promising G.I.

The Pasadena (Cal.) Playhouse College of Theatre Arts has established an annual scholarship for army personnel who, during their tenure of service, show promise in the area of theatrical activity. The first such scholarship, covering tuition and the cost of books for a full year at the college, is to be given next Aug. 15 to an individual returning to civilian status on or after that date who has demonstrated in the year beginning last Aug. 16 theatrical ability as a director, technician or performer.

The scholarship, accepted by the army, was set up by David M. Crandell, president and chairman of the college board.

Preliminaries at Theatre Des Nations A Letdown; Fate of Project in Doubt

Paris, April 30.

As previously set forth in Variety drastic changes confront the theatres in Paris owned by French republic. On prestige enterprise, the annual Theatre of Nations, now seven years old, may lose its tenure at the Sarah Bernhardt Theatre and its founding head, A.M. Julien.

Unhappily for Julien this season's performances to date have not been auspicious. His showmanly quest of broader representation, more countries, new companies, has not been conductive to quality. First phase was at the smaller Recamier prior to transfer April 24 to the Bernhardt.

Except for the hit of U.S. folk blues singer Odetta, the entries have been severely judged by local critics. Too many were thought lacking the stature for this international affair. Even if it entails diplomatic courtesy, they see no reason to invite mediocre plays or companies which add nothing to the drama or Paris as host.

Opera of Mannheim was judged an okay company from a fairly small city while the Manuela Vargas Flamenco Co. from Seville, Spain was felt more for cabaret, on its spirited but repetitive materials.

Shauspieltruppe from Zurich with the romantic "Penthesilea" of Heinrich Von Kleist was rated fair. Theatre of Tunis, doing the late Albert Camus' play "Caligula" in Arabic, was tagged superfluous. Ireland had a lackluster production of Yeats "Countess Cathleen." Mexico sent an old-fashioned attack on an American rich businessman via "The Hour for All." The Recamier stay wound with the Ballet Scapino from Holland in two ballets for children. Charming, yet ordinary was the verdict.

However some big guns are expected at the Sarah Bernhardt with the Opera of Stuttgart, the Royal Shakespeare Company from London with Peter Brook's version of Shakespear's "King Lear" and others.

Bits of London

London, April 26.

Juliet Mills will make her Shakespearian debut as Titania on the Royal Shakespear company spring tour. She will substitute for Virginia McKenna, indisposed.

John Clements and Martin Landau are to present Ronald Millar's adaptation of C. P. Snow's novel, "The Masters." Clements will star.

C. Denier Warren has just celebrated his 50th anni on the stage. He's currently in "Who'll Save The Plowboy."

A memorial service will be held May 7 for the late Anna Deere Wiman at St. Martin's-in-the-Fields. The American-born producer died recently in Bermuda.

Jack Keates, manager of Brighton Royal for 28 years has resigned and will be succeeded by Melville Graham. After a vacation, Keates will become a touring company manager.

Leslie Phillips has taken over from David Tomlinson in the long-running "Boeing-Boeing" comedy at the Appolo.

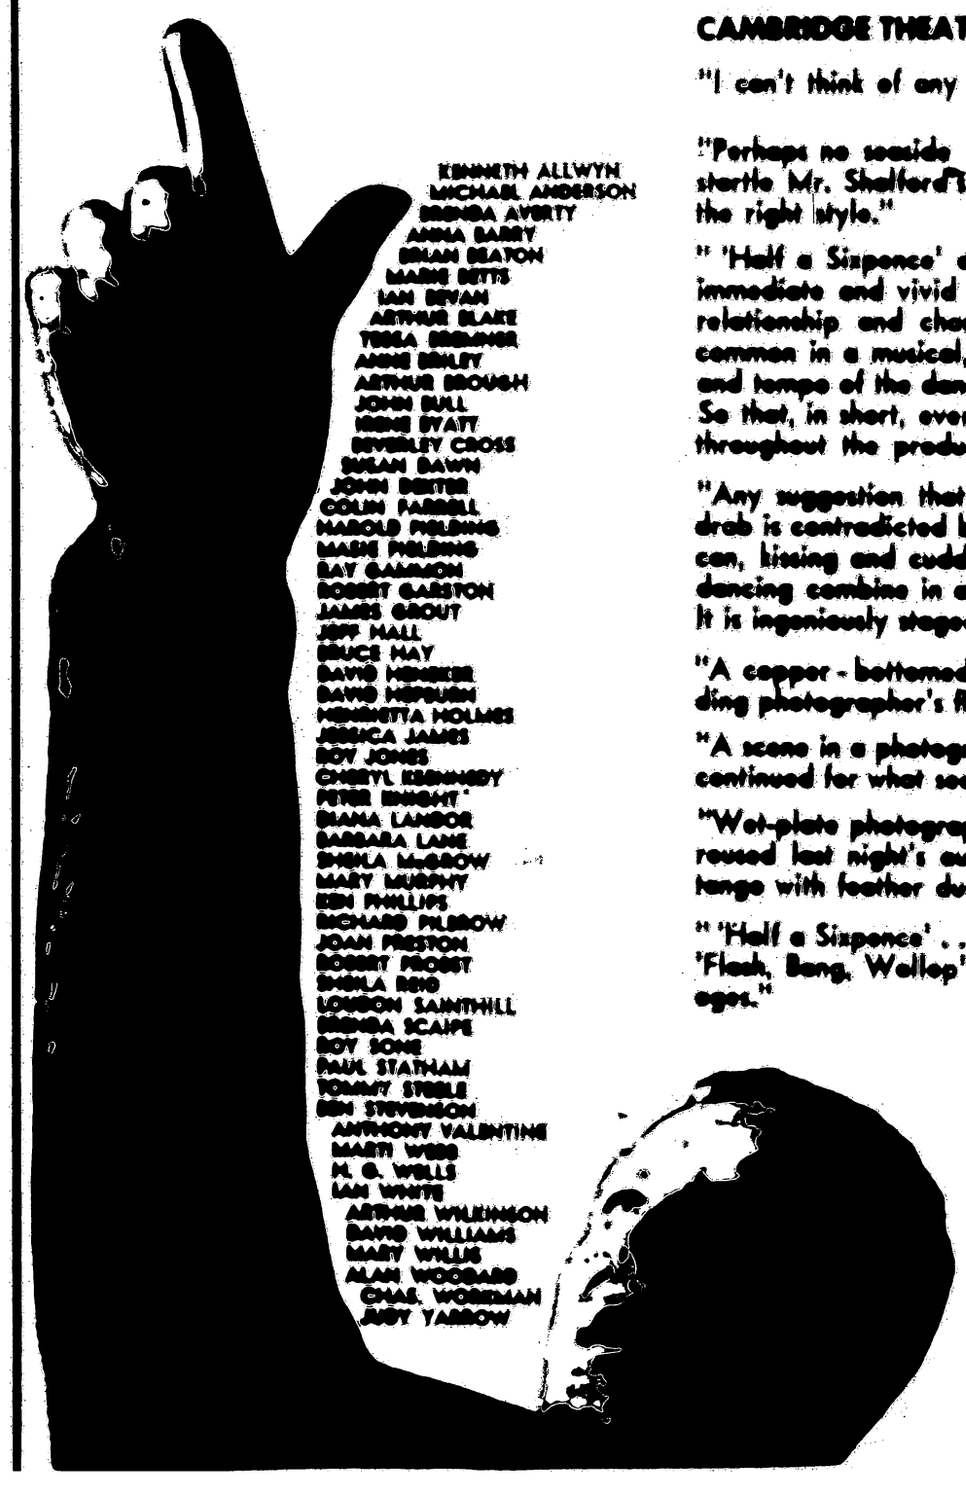
"HALF A SIXPENCE"



CAMBRIDGE THEATRE LONDON

"I can't think of any higher praise for . . . the choreography of Edmund Balin."
—DAILY SKETCH

"Perhaps no seaside linen drapers in 1900 ever saw such high jinks and high kicks as startle Mr. Shalford's emporium, but the dances arranged by Edmund Balin are in exactly the right style."
—NEWS OF THE WORLD

" 'Half a Sixpence' opens in Mr. Shalford's drapery emporium, when we are given an immediate and vivid view of the life the assistants lead and a quick insight into their relationship and character. This is an unusual aspect of the production, and one not common in a musical, when the characters . . . tend to emerge very gradually. The tone and tempo of the dancing and the sort of music we are to hear, are also forcibly indicated. So that, in short, everything gets off to a resounding start, the spirit being maintained throughout the production."
—THE STAGE

"Any suggestion that the life of a draper's assistant in 1900 was dreary, tiresome and drab is contradicted by the opening number where the boys and girls dance a saucy can-can, kissing and cuddling behind bolts of cloth . . . One number in which singing and dancing combine in a Cockney music hall stomp to stop the show is 'Flash, Bang, Wallop'. It is ingeniously staged and exhilaratingly performed."
—THE SUNDAY TELEGRAPH

"A copper-bottomed, knock-down-and-dragout show-stopper built around the wedding photographer's flash picture."
—DAILY MAIL

"A scene in a photographer's studio . . . such good effect that the cheering and applause continued for what seemed like half an hour."
—DAILY EXPRESS

"Wet-plate photography . . . giving the pretext for a wedding group number . . . that roused last night's audience to cheers . . . effective routines, such as a draper's shop tango with feather dusters clenched between the teeth."
—THE TIMES

" 'Half a Sixpence' . . . is in for a long run . . . stopped the show with a number called, 'Flash, Bang, Wallop' . . . a rousing comedy routine that has the audience applauding for ages."
—DAILY MIRROR

"Better than Oliver! . . . these incidents are merely tableaux that are jerked into life by Heneker's songs or Edmund Balin's robust choreography."
—EVENING STANDARD

"Edmund Balin, from Broadway, has welded a lively dancing chorus into a brisk team."

Paris Hit Score Not Bad

vaudeo. Bourvil is a musician who gets mixed up with gangsters. He gets to sing a few comic songs. This is strictly a local bet.

Comedians Jean Poiret and Michel Serrault have concocted a satirical revue "Score Leonard" that has enough laughs and bits to have it in as a hit at the Theatre Fontaine. A parody of boulevard comedies, publicists, the New Wave and other things, it is zesty, wry and well mounted and played. But it is a local item at best.

P. A. Breal's "La Grande Oreille" (The Big Ear) manages to bring off a comedy about Huguenot persecution in 17th. century France. Main plus is actor-director Jacques Fabbri who shows up the stupidity of racism as a harassed town mayor who is both repulsed and drawn by the political benefits of anti-Huguenotism. It will finish the season at the Teatre De Paris.

Pierre Fresnay has adapted, staged and starred in the 18th century Diderot meaning "Le Neveu De Rameau" (The Nephew of Rameau) which has emerged a hit in spite of its tabloidness. Fresnay is a shrewd anarchistic spender who deftly backs up his views with clever talk, insight and philosophizing. Julien Bertheau is a good foil. It is chock verbal theatre and on Fresnay's name and performance should be around for quite a while at the Theatre Michodiere, owned by Fresnay and his wife Yvonne Printemps.

A 1929 play by Roger Vitrac "Victor," as staged by Jean Anouilh, turned out to be a stinging "theatre of the absurd" item and showed as a precursor of Eugene Ionesco, Samuel Beckett and others. About a little boy's (played by an adult) disillusion in his family and their friends, it is played for corrosive comedy and tragedy and comes off.

Play opened at the Ambigu and did well until a few weeks ago when the producers moved it to the Athenee. This led to fights between the producer and Ambigu owner. It looks to finish the season but without the hit that the solid reviews and early returns promised for it.

Francoise Sagan's third play "La Robe Mauve De Valentine" (Valentine's Mauve Dress) came in as a hit mainly on the draw and workmanship of film star Danielle Darrieux. A fragile tale of an older woman and a younger boy, set in a satiric, ironic mood, it has some good observation but is too thin for any foreign transplanting. In fact, Miss Darrieux's recent illness has it shuttered till she can come back next September. It is strictly a personal vehicle, and so Miss Darrieux's return should have another season at the Ambassadeurs.

So much for the top hits which appear to be mainly in the comic and entertainment vein. Usually hit boulevard playwright Marcel Achard came-a-cropper this year with "Turlututu" (Ditty), while Andre Roussin's new one at the Madeleine "Un Amour Qui Ne Finit Pas" (A Love That Never Ends) is considered somewhat too melancholy in spite of the usual triangle setups among two couples.

Roussin's play may finish the season but does not look to be in his usual hit groove. Jacques Deval had only a fair run with a rather old fashioned mixture of lowlife and middle class life in "La Veuve De Mlle." It ran a few months but never caught on. It was at the Gymnase.

There were several specialized entries that got good if not big runs. Eugene Ionesco's grandiloquent look at a dying king "Le Roi Se Meurt" (The King is Dying) still at the Alliance Francaise, is one of Jean Roger Caussin's tour de force, one-man playing of a stage adaptation of Gogol's "Diary of a Madman" (Le Journal D'Un Fou) just winding at the Huchette.

P. Gripari's "Lieutenant Tenant," a comic burlesquistic comedy and drama about Christ Russian, is winding an okay stay at the Gaite-Montparnasse while Roland Dubillard's look at a decaying house and its inmates, "La Maison D'Os" (The Bone House), got good reviews but little biz and is being revived again on various critical articles about it at the Theatre Lutece.

And some okay reprises, long-run boulevard comedies that appeal to provincials, some heavy operettas, plus some okay classical shows, fill out the over 30 theatres in Paris. Though felt to have too many theatres another one just opened, Theatre De Plaisance, that boasts a roof which can be raised or lowered to change the stage's dimensions.

Samaritan Critic

Washington, April 30.

Forget about the man biting the dog. A critic has turned in his pay!

Irving Lowens, music critic for the Washington Star, donated to the Musicians Pension Fund the pay he is to receive for covering a concert benefitting the fund Thursday (2) here.

"If Morton Gould is going to donate his services at the concert to the fund," Lowens wrote while sending in his check, "I feel I can also. Enclosed is the compensation I will earn from the Star for covering the concert."

Gould will conduct the National Symphony Orch in a pops concert for the benefit.

Blanche Thebom Hitting Summer Music Circuses

Met opera mezzo Blanche Thebom has a variety of musical assignments lined up for this summer. Beginning July 1, she's scheduled to star in "Music in the Air" for a week each at the South Shore Music Circus, Cohasset, Mass.; the Cape Cod Melody Tent, Hyannis, Mass., and the North Shore Music Circus, Beverly, Mass.

Following these three dates, she'll take off for the Coast for a July 24 engagement at the Hollywood Bowl where she's to sing "Scheherezade" with the orch helmed by Andre Kostelanetz. Miss Thebom is then slated to go to Atlanta for an Aug. 8-11 stand in "Call Me Madam" at the Municipal Theatre Under the Stars.

Quick Closing of 'Rare Birds'

Paris Musical Producers Dismayed — French Capital Risky Soil for Tuners

Paris, April 30.

One of the fastest legit folds since the war is the musical "Les Oiseaux Rares" (The Rare Birds) which opened at the Theatre Montparnasse Wed. (17) and closed Sat. (20). Written by Renee Lheste and J. L. Chauby, reviews were lukewarm, biz negligible and producers Guy Bertil and Marguerite Jamois decided to close it fast to avoid getting burned too badly.

This is rare here since generally low production and operating costs compared to other countries, and the 30-day lay tax offered all shows usually have them trying to go along at least for a month. Sometimes word of mouth has overcome bad reviews.

But rising costs and lackluster theatre attendance have convinced most producers that those days are over and it is better to shutter fast if the show does not look in for at least fair houses. Paris may very well become like Broadway in this respect.

Also annoyed by this quick demise are the various producers prepping stage tuners on the assumption that more modern musical tastes are awakening in French audiences. However they may not have to worry too much since "Birds" did not have the big production, breezy performance and wedding of dance, song and action which are the hallmarks of the U. S. musicals.

Concerning two couples involved in criss-cross affairs and yearning for a trip to the U. S., this was mainly a light comedy with some patter songs, ordinary music and practically no leerping. This should not crimp the plans for French productions of "Now Is Succeed in Business Without Really Trying," "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to The Forum" and "Carnival" next season.

Joyce Trisler is choreographing the off-Broadway production of "Put It In Writing."

CARSON TO RUN PABST

City-Owned Legit Stand Ousts Three-Man Team

Milwaukee, April 26.

Richard C. Carson, 43, of Tulsa, Okla., has been named general manager of the Pabst legitimate theatre here. He takes over from a trio of managers, Sydney Piotkin, Raymond Mitchell and Harry Lashinsky.

In 1969, City of Milwaukee bought the old Pabst, indicating it would be operated until the city's new music hall-theatre was built. Some $40,00 was spent redecorating. Later, a new corporation was formed to run it, and Piotkin, Mitchell and Lashinsky were hired to manage it.

CENTRAL CITY SPLURGES ON LYRIC OFFERINGS

Denver, April 30.

Frank M. Richetson Jr., former Denver showman who is proxy of the Central City Opera House Assn., says this season's budget for its two operas will be $191,000, the most expensive in its history.

Capacity audiences with no complimentaries could only bring in $147,000, so a deficit is in the offing for the little playhouse in the old mining town west of Denver. However the situation isn't really so bleak, as the association's other enterprises—which includes two tourist hotels—and the annual four week run of a top Broadway play, always a sellout, usually brings the green take up to a healthy figure. In 1959 it even reported a net profit of $12,412, unusual for an opera festival operation.

A great effort is being made, according to reports, to have "Never Too Late," as this year's play and Richetson says they are hoping to sign William Bendix as the post-middleaged hero.

Mankowitz's Film Novel

The film industry might well accuse Wolf Mankowitz of biting the hand that feeds him. His latest novel, "Cockatrice" (Longmans; $2.30) tears the film business apart with savage, relentless cynicism. He describes the cockatrice as "a fabulous, serpent-like monster hatched against nature out of the egg of a cock. It consorted with basilisks and satyrs, and its breath was deadly, its glare fatal to human beings." Mankowitz opines that "the cockatrice seems an appropriate heraldic beast for the film industry."

Mankowitz is a shrewd observer of the show biz scene. His yarn concerns the sycophantic personal assistant of a film producer who tries to doublecross his boss in his absence by setting up an indie deal with the producer's new sex-symbol discovery. From then on its a hardhitting satire of doublecrossing, chicanery and blackmail.

Danny Pisarev, Mankowitz's "hero," doesn't quite make it. Nor does Mankowitz. His staccato style occasionally palls and his obsession with sex and uninhibited language seems rather overdone. But the crisp humor, wit and racy gusto with which Mankowitz decks out his story rates the novel good company.

Maybe a little too parochial for the average reader. But Mankowitz should worry. The film rights of the novel have already been bought by Leslie Perkyn and Julian Wintle, two permanent residents in The Land of the Cockatrice. Putnam is the U. S. publisher. Rich.

Clay Blair Expanding

With the exit of Curtis Anderson as editor of Ladies' Home Journal after a year's tenure—he succeeded longtime editors Bruce and Beatrice Gould—and the naming of Hubbard H. Cobb as his successor, the expanding influence of Clay Blair Jr. is seen. Latter, besides being editor-in-chief of the Saturday Evening Post, is also editorial director of all Curtis publications.

It was in Anderson's absence that Blair ordered an article yanked. Blair had been noticed as moving in more and more on LHJ's operations and, it is stated, his aim is to "top McCall's." The "gradual" changes manifested in Satevepost makeup and editorial concept, to date, will be carried over into LHJ.

Cobb was editor of The American Home, also Curtis. Anderson is said to have expressed himself, that "an editor has to run his own magazine." No successor yet to The American Home editorship.

'The Independent Man'

"The Independent Man" by Keith Saunders (Saunders Press, $6), is the biography of the late W. O. Saunders, prominent southern journalist who ran the Elizabeth City (N.C.) weekly paper, The Independent, from 1908 until his death in 1937.

Saunders belonged to breed of vanishing newspapermen, like William Allen White of Emporia, Kans., who owned his own paper, wrote what he pleased, and feared no one. Like White, he became a national figure.

Tome is written with filial respect by journalist's son, a writer and editor for American Aviation Publications, and carries complement of items typical of a small-town weekly, plus accounts of elder Saunders' crusading tendencies. Editor's salty character led to humorous situations in New York and elsewhere, as well as in his hometown. He was possessed of cogent sense of responsibility as an American as well as being a good citizen of Elizabeth City.

Fine reading for all who are interested in a disappearing phase of U.S. life and letters. Rodo.

Cerf's Own 'New Frontier'

Bennett Cerf is putting three Harvard alumni on the payroll as soon as they graduate in June 11. All are Lampoon staffers. One of them is his 22-year-old son Chris who already has cut a platter for MGM Records but who will learn the publishing business. The other two are Michael Frith, editor-in-chief of the Lampoon, his roommate, and Michael Goodkind, business manager of the undergraduate humorous monthly, who will go into the promotion-advertising department of Random House.

Cerf and Frith coauthored a satire on Ian Fleming's "James Bond" whodunit character, titled "Alligator," which the Harvard Lampoon published as a supplement and sold 60,000 copies.

'Jap' Ruled Out

The word Jap is to be eliminated in all Ontario school textbooks in subsequent editions, following complaints of the Japanese-Canadian Citizens Ass'n, with hq in Toronto. Edward Ide, prexy, claims the term is "derogatory" and said its use in a school text was "unbelievable."

According to J.M. McCarty, superintendent of Ontario's Dep't of Education, publishers agreed to drop the "derogatory" term in future editions. (Ontario has a third of Canada's population.)

'Writers of the Future'

Bennett Cerf, prez of Random House and Knopf, cites that of Time mag's recent roster of "10 writers of the future" he has seven of those signed up between those two firms.

Of established authors, Cerf has just harnessed Richard Condon, Pamela Frankau and Alfred Chester, latter a New Yorker scribe.

Incidentally, RH will publish new London playwright James Saunders' "Next Time I'll Sing For You," slated for fall Broadway production.

Book of Characters

Most people know that Sam Weller is a character in "Pickwick Papers," that Iago crops up alarmingly in "Othello" and that Eliza Doolittle appeared in "Pygmalion" before "My Fair Lady."

But other characters in books and plays can become dimly hazy. William Freeman has come to the rescue with a work of monumental energetic reference called "Dictionary of Fictional Characters" (Dent; $8.30).

It lists around 20,000 fictional characters culled from about 2,000 books covering nine centuries of literature. Freeman has not stuck only to British literature and drama but has also nosed around America and the Commonwealth.

Gibbs Aides McCormick

Wolcott Gibbs Jr. is now assistant to Ken McCormick, editor-in-chief of the trade publishing division of Doubleday. He was last the publicity manager. Douglas Andrews, ex-NBC, has succeeded Gibbs.

Linda Cohen has been named publicity projects manager at Doubleday and will continue publicizing Doubleday's several paperback lines. Miss Cohen, after graduating from Smith, has directed publicity for Anchor Books the past five years.

Connie Soloyanis, former editorial assistant to My Gardner and prior to that to the late Damon Walker, and now a resident of Athens, has written "Athens by Night," a handbook for tourists, in conjunction with Vic Walker, editor of the Athens News.

Watts' Novel

Stephen Watts, an experienced ex-film, ex-drama critic and a contributor to the N.Y. Times and New Yorker, is on safe ground with his new novel, "Sober and Properly Dressed" (Bodley Head; $2.50).

He has set it in the newspaper and theatre worlds that he knows intimately. The result is a smoothly witty and perceptive novel in which incident takes second place to shrewd characterization.

His hero is a middleaged, divorced provincial don. He has a financial windfall and shakes off his surroundings for a protracted vacation in London. In somewhat quixotic manner he becomes a guest theatre critic for a newspaper. From then on he is involved in intrigue and doubledealing on both sides of the journalistic and theatrical fence. Climax is when he and his proprietor boss become entangled with the same dame.

Watts writes with urbane charm, zest, civilized humor and, above all, with knowhow of his subject. Result is a light but pleasant novel which has a great deal more depth than a casual reading might suggest. Rich.

Conn's Prize

Stewart Conn, 26-year-old general programs producer with the BBC in Scotland, has won the first of four Gregory Awards for 1963.

The Gregory Trust, for encouragement of young poets, authors, etc., was set up under terms of a bequest by the late E. C. Gregory, a benefactor of Leeds (Eng.) University, who died in 1959. The bequest named six judges, who nominate the annual winners. The judges are T. S. Eliot, Henry Moore, Sir Herbert Read, Prof. Bonamy Dobree, E. D. Humphries and Leonard Wade.

The top award, won by Conn, is $1,150.

Conn's poetry, which brought him the award, has been published in leading journals and in American and Canadian publications, and has been broadcast in the U.K.

His stage play "Breakdown," given a Charles Henry Foyle commendation last year, was performed by Glasgow Citizens' Theatre in 1961. His second radio play "Cadenza for Real" is shortly being broadcast in Scotland.

SCULLY'S SCRAPBOOK

By Frank Scully

Palm Springs.

Of seven great Danes, I knew four. They were Karl Dane, Carl Brisson, Jean Hersholt and Peter Freuchen.

The ones I didn't know were Canute, the Wave-waver, Hamlet, the Nut, and Victor Borge, the even more amazing nut.

As a performer Borge acted as if he were superior to his talents. He could laugh at them now and then. He provided the greatest entertainment of those ski-jumpers who as a race can't ski. All of those great Danes except Borge are dead, of course, and his last performance at Lincoln Center showed some hard breathing.

The Old Lamp Lighter Lights Up

Of the other Danes, I knew Carl Brisson longest. I admired the way at 60 when the Nazis had more or less bombed him out of all his possessions abroad, he went back to basic training near Malibu Beach and put himself into such excellent physical condition that he became the Sinatra of the Dowager Set.

To take up singing and dancing again when you're retired and have it made requires a peculiar kind of courage. Brisson had it. He went to night clubs and charmed old gals out of their bedroom slippers. Also, he could sing well. Nobody ever sang "Cocktails for Two" or "The Old Lamp Lighter" better.

As for pictures, he never made the earth stand still. Abroad I was always in his corner. I thought British interurban pix didn't know what to do with him but that Hollywood would. They didn't. Elinor Glyn even wrote a special for him called "Knowing Men." Audiences refused to acknowledge the introduction.

As for Jean Hersholt, I was merely a buck private in an army of people who privately admired him. Though as an actor he never came into the kind of money that Dick Powell left, nor the stardom enjoyed by Gary Cooper, he was outstanding in character parts and a gentleman to his fingertips.

Hersholt Handles The Baby

I remember his using his fingers as well as his arms to transport one of our babies across the threshold of Bedside Manor. How he came there I can't remember except that we were very clubby in those days. As my lady Alice was a Scandinavian they had this added touch in common. Anyway, there he was, there to welcome us home from the hospital and carry the baby upstairs to her crib.

Another time I remember our eating in a cheap joint on Hollywood Blvd. and putting the bite on Jean for a political contribution. He came up with $500 and I never felt like a big time larcenist so much in my life as when I accepted it. I hate people who use pressure to affect a result but I suspect that most of us are so lethargic that we would do precious little if it were not for the pressure of friends or deadlines.

On another occasion at his house for dinner Jean showed some home movies of a visit he and Via had made to Copenhagen where he had been decorated by the King. Hugh Walpole was there and Jean tried to get Eric von Stroheim to come over.

Von Stroheim Runs Into Flat Trouble

But von Stroheim was in a peculiar position at that moment. He had privately begun proceedings to divorce his wife when she had been horribly burned about the face in a beauty parlor accident. Von, a highly sensitive and civilized mittel-European, couldn't go through with the divorce and was so broken up by the accident that he didn't feel that he would be one to add much conviviality to a Hersholt party. I talked to him on the phone and it was the last time I ever did talk to him.

Jean's work as prez of the Academy and also as prez of the Motion Picture Country Home are too well-known to need fresh airing. But his knowledge of painting and his private collection were rare things in that town at that time. He also was the town's foremost book-collector. These touches in a guy who played slimy characters with alarming conviction were very comforting. It was hard to believe this was the same guy who appeared in "Greed," "Stella Dallas," "The Battle of the Sexes," "Grand Hotel" and "Dinner at Eight."

Godly, Nearly 30 Years Ago?

By 1934, however, he had turned a corner. He played in "Men in White," which shows this sterilized stuff has been around a long time, and by 1936 he had become a prisoner of Zanuck and had taken them all out of hock in "The Country Doctor."

After he fell into the role of the doctor in the Dionne quintuplets' picture he thrived for years in radio as a benign medic whose advice helped his "patients" in more ways than physical.

Perhaps the longest range fringe benefit he got out of this was the Country Doctor tobacco, which netted him $30,000 a year. I forget whether he ever smoked it, but then how much did Jack Benny smoke Lucky Strikes? In fact, one of the great myths of selling is "you can't sell a product unless you're sold on it yourself."

Though I knew Carl Brisson longest and had great times with him, I never really knew him well, because he was "on" most of the time. This isn't a great fault and in his case if he hadn't been everlastingly working at his craft I doubt he would have succeeded as well as he did. But it does make friendship a little less than relaxing.

Cleo Was Carl's Thundering Herd

He had a wonderful family. His wife Cleo was his greatest fan. I doubt from the moment she met him to the day he died if she ever looked at him with a critical eye. Her sister Tillie was a better dancer than Carl but she soon tired of show business, whereas Carl never did. Nor did Cleo.

One time we met outside the Casino in Monte Carlo after an interval of several years, and Cleo's first remark was not "How do you feel?" or "How are things going?" but "How does Carl look?" It was a good indication of what they thought was important.

Freddy Brisson Revolts

I remember first seeing their son Freddy backstage in a Seabag of entertainment called the Metropolitan. It was in London's Edgeware Road and has since been torn down. Freddy was about 17 at the time and was beginning to revolt against being brigaded as Carl's "brother," a device designed to keep Carl young.

Fred subsequently broke into the agency biz and from there his success as a Broadway and Hollywood producer has become an authentic success story. His marriage to Rosalind Russell, which is one of the best Hollywood has had a hand in, remains as proof that show biz and marriage vows are mergeable.

Carl, The Patriarch

Years ago we were having one of those barbeque steak dinners that Freddy and Rosalind in Beverly Hills. Carl and Cleo were guests, too, and I always remembered with what pliability Rosalind Russell applied herself to the needs of a guy who didn't want to be known as her father-in-law, but wanted her to be known as his daughter-in-law.

He was a great one for billing—either at home or on a marquee. R.I.P.

Dutton keyed its "Rudolph Nureyev" autobiography to the Royal Ballet star's Met debut in "Giselle" last week. Incidentally, the publisher's jacket gave such prominence to Richard Avedon's photography as to give some misimpression that the latter collaborated on the biog, other than the lens work.

Anthony Quinn off to Naples Friday (26) on the Cristoforo Colombo; sailing for Gibraltar were songwriter Harry Warren and Chester Conn, prexy of Bregman, Vocco & Conn; also aboard were Mr. and Mrs. Frank Chapman (former Metopera singer Gladys Swarthout) who are disembarking at Genoa.

With the "better" weather, nitery and restaurant business is definitely in the upbeat. However, three White Turkey restaurants (the Town House, one in Sutton Place, and the third in Murray Hill sector) have filed under Chapter XI of the Bankruptcy Act, petitioning for an arrangement of debts; terms to be submitted.

Ethel Shutta, who costarred with Eddie Cantor in Ziegfeld's "Whoopee," which also featured her husband George Olsen's band, marks her Broadway legit comeback in 30 years with the signing by Richard Halliday to have her play the mother of "Jenny," Mary Martin's upcoming musical. Ex-husband Olsen, incidentally, is also ex-bandleader; now operates a restaurant in Jersey.

Rock 'n' Roll to Holy Rollers

Roll. Each successive brand of rhythm became more stirring and more violent with each progression.

The Holy Roll steers the participant in a slightly different direction. There's no dance movement involved, just straight rhythm whether it's pounded out by hand, foot, tambourine or stirrer against the glass. Maybe some will even assimilate words and get a different kind of message than what they're been accustomed to in night clubs. This remains to be seen.

No 'Name' Gospelers

Joe Scandore, who operates the Sweet Christ, along with the Elegante, Brooklyn, has installed three singing groups, all of whom work feverishly to organ, piano and drum background. The Nat Lewis Singers open, followed by the Howard Stevens Singers, and the Ellison Singers close. They're dressed with variations. All the women wear the gospel garb, and there is evidence of the academic type gown for some of the men. With organ in the background, there could be that ecclesiastic feeling, but it's translated into jazz terms that stir the singer and viewer alike.

Scandore says that it will be extremely difficult to get representative name groups into the Sweet Christ, a name incidentally, suggested by Dennis Hattin. Scandore said he was told to call it the Gospel Truth, but the State Liquor Authority vetoed that.

Scandore declares that he had been turned down by gospel-singing by "names" in the field because of the serving of liquor. The groups that do now however also have sung in churches and various affairs, but are not strictly pro. However, they work with an avidness that the pro lost when he learned how to deal with audiences knowledgeably. For Scandore's purposes it's a better artistic proposition than also financial.

One of the major functions of religion is to preach the gospel to the sinner and the disbeliever. Where's a better place than in a eatery? This constitutes the ultimate fulfillment of the revivalists' functions by working there which would answer those objecting to the mixture of gospel and grape.

Religious Jazz

Religion and jazz have been fused long ago and ecclesiasts' objections become weaker and less valid with time. Several "Jazz Masses" have been performed in churches. One of the international hits is the current "Black Nativity" which utilizes two gospel groups, telling the story of the first Christmas in terms of jazz and a strong beat. It has been praised internationally. Thus, both juvenile and adult, delinquents, are exposed to the word of the gospel.

Scandore is also combining religion and sex. It's one of the few eateries in the city with waitresses. Incidentally, they are integrated as far as color lines are concerned. They're dressed in the garb of angels with wings sewn on back. However, the angel gowns are only hip-length, they have much leotards the rest of the way. Their trays are tambourines. Lest any customer think he can get away with a tambourine, Scandore has evolved the pattern of checking off each instrument as it's distributed. When the check comes, they've got to return it or be charged as high as $6 for the instrument, depending on its size.

Of course, gospel singing isn't new to Manhattan. Dooley Joe Bostic annually puts on a congress of such singers at Madison Square Garden. Theatrically, the Apollo Theatre in Harlem, discovered their value some years ago, and plays such shows several times a year. The record companies have projected such groups for disking, and some albums have been artistic and financial successes. At this point, it's not known whether these have made any converts in the Billy Sunday or Billy Graham tradition. But this much is known—it's not entertainment for atheists.

Lee, who has been conducting a course in playwriting at the College of Theatre of Pasadena Playhouse, will be awarded a Master of Arts Degree there this June. He has turned his lectures and hopes to make a book out of them to be entitled: "Writing Without Rules."

Team's award-winning "Inherit the Wind" has now been translated into 37 languages. The most recent translation was made by the playwrights themselves, who have converted it into an all-male version. Dramatists Play Service will publish it. The standard version continues to be one of DPS's most popular plays with amateur, college, and stock groups.

San Quentin Spurred It

It was San Quentin Prison which suggested the all-male version to L&L. Dore Schary-Blackburn, who was Mrs. Upson in the team's "Auntie Mame" on Broadway, has been unofficial adviser to the drama group at Quentin. She suggested "Inherit" and the group obtained permission from the playwrights to make the change. It was so successful that L&L prepared the printed version for the hundreds of boys' school and all-male colleges, hungry for plays with non-feminine roles. The part of Rachel, the girl friend, has been converted to Joshua, the defendant's best friend. The part of Mrs. Brady has been deleted completely.

Interesting sidelight was program from San Quentin, which lists Bernard Finch (Dr Finch of the celebrated Finch-Carole Tregoff murder case) as Assistant Director.

Following the awarding of his Doctorate at June Commencement in Columbus, Lawrence makes his annual European trek. He will be in London June 18 to July 1, then to Paris for Bastille Day, which is his birthday. Lee and his actress wife, Janet Waldo, plan a short trip to Latin America.

Lawrence & Lee have also been working on a long one-act play, "The Bard of Culver City," written especially for Shakespeare's 400th birthday celebration next April.

Brando-Alpert

was written the name Hollis Alpert."

Prior to the time the tape was aired, Alpert was shown a transcript of Brando's remarks, and, according to Alpert, it was his turn to just drop his jaw down to his navel. According to him, he had gone to interview Brando at a press agent's request in New York when he was making "The Fugitive Kind" in 1959. It was a very pleasant talk, but there was no story, Alpert now relates, adding that since he is a free lance writer, he never would have done the press agent-requested interview as a rep of the Saturday Review, though it might be that the press agent had described Alpert that way to Brando.

Two years later, Alpert continues, he did a story for Cosmopolitan, not Redbook, titled: "Marlon Brando and The Ghost of Stanley Kowalski," which Alpert describes as a "critical analysis" of Brando's work as an actor. When preparing that piece, he had tried to contact Brando and, in fact, been set for a cross-country telephone interview, which Brando cancelled at the last minute. Thus, says Alpert, Brando certainly knew that he was doing the article for Cosmopolitan.

In light of all these alleged misstatements on Brando's part, a Susskind — or WNEW-TV—press agent, arranged a new phone talk between Brando and Alpert before the show was aired. During this talk, according to Alpert, Brando admitted that he had been somewhat fuzzy on his facts, but then wondered why such a good reporter as Alpert should do outside work: "Why don't you stick to the Saturday Review?" Alpert's answer: "If I did, I'd starve." The upshot of the conversation was Brando's agreeing that perhaps something should be done about erasing some of the more flagrant errors on the Susskind tape. Apparently, however, the tape was shown pretty much as it was recorded.

According to Alpert, one of the groups most hurt by Brando's remarks were Cosmopolitan execs; they didn't like Redbook getting all that panning credit which rightly belonged to them.

If you're a Hope regular you'll have heard the routines quoted, and you'll have acquired before now an awareness of the trying circumstances under which the shows were produced, but the book will round out your knowledge of the mechanics and procedures entailed. If you're not a regular, of course, you can join up on any page in the book.

It isn't all funny. Twice Hope the comedian stops to explain why Hope the man makes those Yuletide flights. On page 140 he says, "Certain things are burned into your memory, sort of like the afterimage you get closing your eyes when you've been looking into a bright light. In Korea it was the faces of the men at Wallenstein Bowl. We didn't get there until early afternoon, and these guys had been sitting there since nine in the morning. They came early to get a good seat in the snow. When you see these combat troops squatting in the snow, hungry for any break in their drab routine, you feel like you're in the right racket." And on page 148 he says, grinning but leveling, "With all my traveling around the globe, I've acquired a reputation for being a GI entertainer. There have been newspaper and magazine stories about my devotion to the GIs. Well, I do love these guys. We have a certain rapport. I know what these guys have done took plenty of guts and courage — and they admired my act, too."

Hope doesn't owe Russia anything—or anybody else.

Similarly, from "Annie Get Your Gun" (1946 legit; Metro film, 1950), came the "Show Business" title for 20th-Fox (Sol C. Siegel) pic in 1954, which included Ethel Merman, Dan Dailey, Donald O'Connor, Marilyn Monroe, Johnnie Ray and Mitzi Gaynor in the cast.

When Berlin got $600,000 for his "Easter Parade" package in 1948, also done by Freed, Metro still had a stable of stars to cull from, and thus Judy Garland, Fred Astaire, Peter Lawford and Ann Miller were slotted in it. The new "Music" pic, in this day and age of individual negotiations, of course will have to be cast as availabilities permit.

Berlin has a percentage of "Music" which will utilize at least 25 of his standards plus six newies. Incidentally, "Say It With Music" was authored for the first "Music Box Revue," the West 45th St. playhouse originally owned three-ways among Berlin, the late Joe Schenck and the Shuberts; later it became a 50-50 partnership when Schenck sold out to both. The song, composed in 1921, was designed by Berlin to serve as a sort of "official" theme song for a theatre appropriately named the Music Box.

Not Autobiographical

"Alexander's Ragtime Band" (20th-Fox, 1938), with Tyrone Power, Don Ameche, Alice Faye, was regarded by some as a "free" biopic of the songsmith's career, because Power played a songwriter role, but neither this nor "Say It With Music," as has been a recent Hollywood rumor, are autobiographical. If there are any real-life incidents attendant to some song, they may be incorporated, but Berlin's own biographies have long been set down for posthumous, if any. This is a personal credo. (In "Alexander's Ragtime Band" there was recreated the dramatic finale from "Yip Yip Yaphank," Berlin's first soldier show when he was a sergeant at Camp Upton (Long Island); it showed the doughboys marching down from the stage into the audience, presumably "off to the front," and was a theatrical device in the soldier show which Darryl F. Zanuck reincorporated into the "Ragtime" filmusical.) (Berlin also wrote "This Is The Army," the World War II soldier show—now they were called GIs, vis-a-vis the doughboys of 1918—and this time, too, he was a civilian.)

"Blue Skies," in 1946, was another Paramount filmusical tagged with a Berlin standard, costarring Astaire-Crosby, with Joan Caulfield.

Then, save for the title song to "Sayonara" (1957), there was a Berlin blackout on the Broadway and Hollywood fronts, so far as original productions were concerned, for 12 and 9 years respectively.

When Berlin marked his "Broadway comeback" last year he did it with a bang. "Mr. President" clocked $2,000,000 in advance sales; and the "advance" from Columbia Records for the "original cast" album rights is said to have virtually underwritten the entire production cost of the show. ("I wouldn't pay $1,000,000 blind for anything, no matter it's reputation," was Berlin's laconic observation at the time).

To tradesters the Berlin undertaking of another filmusical is remarkable for a "kid of 75" because of his own predilection for songplugging. With each new undertaking the vet songsmith reverts to instinctive basic music biz training and hits the road with interviews, disk jockey bookings and the like, for benefit of (a) his catalog and (b) the b.o.

Iceland's 'Revenge'

a local taxidriver, 'He is not like the other Americans'."

Congressman Frank J. Becker (N.Y.-R.) communicated with U.S. Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara "demanding Pentagon action" against American military personnel who participated in this film. Associated Press quoted Becker that he "based his action on an article (i.e. film review) in VARIETY".

The April 17, 1963 critique by Denk, from Goteberg, Sweden, where he reviewed this 81-minute feature, concluded that the reaction to this film "has already made front page news in the Swedish press".

The Stivell production release of an Edda production, directed by Erik Balling, from a screenplay by Gudlaur Rosenbrentz, from a book by I.G. Thorsteinsson, features Kristbjorg Kjeld, Gunnar Eyjolfsson and Robert Arnfinnsson, local Icelandic players. The invidious element of story lies with two American cast members, who round out the entire cast of five.

The film, per se, is bushleague. The VARIETY review lees off, "This first picture ever produced on the tiny island of Iceland is a typical beginner's work. There is an awful lot of pathetic acting, moralising, car driving, boring landscapes and much too much cigaret smoking and whiskey drinking as 'business' performed by stage actors working before cameras . . . When the driver realizes that his prospective bride is a girl who entertains U.S. officers from a nearby base he gets mad, also sad, and performs a clumsy car-suicide . . . but on the whole this is a picture of very slim export chances".

Defense Dept. Confirms

Washington, April 30.

Defense Dept. has confirmed the accuracy of the Icelandic motion picture "scandal" disclosed in VARIETY. All the action which will be taken was quietly carried out last November. Assistant Defense Secretary Arthur Sylvester told a press conference that VARIETY was correct in reporting that two U.S. military men on duty in Iceland were allowed to portray drunken U.S. Army officers and girl corrupters in the Icelandic film, "Gogo," which was recently released in Sweden.

Sylvester identified the two men as Lawrence Schnepf, then a Navy ensign and now a lieutenant (jg), and John Daniel Teasy, a Navy electrician, first class.

The Pentagon ran an investigation of the incident last November which was never publicized, Sylvester said. It was found, he continued, that Schnepf and Teasy had obtained the permission of the public information officer, a name-protected lieutenant commander, at the big joint Army-Navy-Air Force base at Keflavik, Iceland, to appear in the film during off-duty hours. The PIO had requested a copy of the script but never got it, according to Sylvester. He cleared the two servicemen to participate without reading it.

Upshot of it all was an order relieving the PIO of his duty and transferring him to another command.

No other disciplinary action was taken. Schnepf, a reservist is leaving active duty this June. Teasy, is a career serviceman, Sylvester stated they were in the clear because they had the permission of a superior to be in the film which depicted the U.S. military in a bad light.

view. He politely declined an invitation to postpone the interview.

In response to a few questions, he sank into periods of history he was dealing in. "Frontiers of Freedom," which he is producing, traces the origins and development of freedom in the western world. Neither the trill of police whistles, nor the sirens of fire engines, disturbed him too much. It so happened that the noise of Madison Ave never seemed shriller at the time of the interview.

With the windows closed, Wolff skipped from such topics as art, religion, the theatre, past and present, politics, old and new.

"Isn't it ironic to have a king and queen fronting a show on the growth of democracy?" (King and Queen of Greece talk about the Athenian democracy in the initial episode of "Frontiers of Freedom.")

"Not at all. You're an unreconstructed American revolutionist. There's constitutional democracy Britain. And people will tune into watch a King and Queen rather than a scholar tell about the origins of Greek culture," Wolff replied.

"While doing the show on Greek culture, it occurred to me to do a show on the Greek theatre. We had the cameramen there." That's the genesis of the projected series on the history of theatre, with Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne narrating and acting in "Athens, Where the Theatre Began."

Wolff's grasp of history, its cross - currents and nuances, prompted the question of whether he's a scholar.

"No. Like everyone else I got tired feet walking through museums. It really didn't come alive for me until I got started on the shows I'm doing. Now I'm enthusiastically learning and it's alive for me."

In his absence, Clive Chu is in charge, on leave from Trader Vic's in the Caribe Hilton which he will be managing on his return. The Fifth Anniversary celebration will be combined with the 5th Annual Summer Rum Festival to be held on June 20.

Webb & Knapp (Zeckendorf) plans reacquiring leases on several hotels it had sold to realty syndicates in recent years although retaining operational contracts. First two such rehaps are the Astor and Manhattan Hotels' management contracts. The master lease on both is held by Manastor Associates, which will receive a total of $1,000,000 in cash by the end of April on acount of Zeckendorf's repurchase of said leases a down payment of over $300,000 was made last week. The rest of the $5,750,000 repurchase price will be paid in installments for the next 20 years.

Yachtsman-industrialist Alexander Rorke Jr., 36, whose Vinlyann III made 11 raids on Cuba before British authorities, like the Americans, frowned on the Bahamas being used as a yacht basin from which the military forays were made on Castro-land, is married to Jacqueline Billingsley. She is the daughter of Stork Club boniface Sherman Billingsley. They have three children. After seizure of his yacht, Rorke, 36 and a photographer, participated last week in air raids on oil refineries outside of Havana. He said he took pictures of it and also denies he is violating U.S. neutrality since he and his adventurous colleagues utilize no U.S. soil, but doesn't indicate from whence he originates.

FILM IMPORTS ON A SEESAW

Education Saved Literate's Life; Now Negro Book Looms as Film

Paul Crump, the literate Negro convicted of robbery-murder in 1958 in Chicago, who educated himself while awaiting the death chair until Gov. Otto Kerner of Illinois commuted his sentence to 199 years last August, has authored "Burn, Killer, Burn!" which is being offered to films. Joseph E. Levine and Sammy Davis Jr. had previously revealed interest in this saga of a Chicago crime but Johnson Pub. Co. of Chicago, has sold in Oscar Collier to agent the rights anew.

Johnson, which publishes Ebony, Jet and Negro Digest, started a hardcover book division last fall and "Burn" was its first title last November. It has been sold to France and Sweden and negotiations for the Italian, Japanese and Danish editions are in work.

When Life put the spotlight on Crump's rehabilitation in jail, attorney Louis Nizer journeyed to Cook County to voluntarily plead the cause that advances in modern penology methods were substantiated by Crump's case, where self-education and dedicated service to other inmates pointed up his rehabilitation; that while the degree of his criminal background is not up for review, his incarceration for almost 10 years under sentence of death, pending repeated appeals, warranted humane re-

British Acad Awards Partly Echo U.S. Oscar

London, May 7.

British Film Academy Awards for 1962 were revealed tonight (Tues.) at a dinner presided over by the Academy's chairman, Anthony Havelock-Allan. Columbia's "Lawrence of Arabia" was the source of three of the 11 awards. It was voted the Best Film from Any Source, thus, naturally, also copping the Award for the Best British Film. Robert Bolt's "Lawrence" script was voted the best British screenplay and Peter O'Toole as

UPS & DOWNS IN U.S. MARKET

By VINCENT CANBY

An examination of the rentals earned by foreign language films in the U.S.-Canadian market in 1962 shows the total holding fairly steady, but notable differences from producing country to producing country. The most striking revelation of VARIETY's annual survey: the total absence in 1962 of such special phenomena as the smash successes scored by "Never on Sunday," "Two Women" and "La Dolce Vita" in 1961, and by Brigitte Bardot and by the Italo muscle specs in earlier years.

Excluding from consideration, for the moment, British product, whose financial roots so often reach back to the States, VARIETY finds that last year 718 foreign features (in both subtitled and voice-dubbed versions) earned total domestic U.S. rentals of $25,400,177. This is down slightly from both 1961, when 782 films earned $28,866,145, and 1960, when 768 imports earned $27,316,119. The dip, however, seems to reflect the dearth in 1962 of one of those aforementioned "runaway" hits which have marked previous years, rather than any sudden change in film tastes on the part of American audiences.

As tradesters analyze 1962, it was a period of adjustment—inevitable, necessary and even healthful—after five years of fantastic growth. In the opinion of many U.S. distribs, the 1962 figures should serve as a forceful reminder to European producers that the American market does have its boxoffice absorption rate and limit and that only once in a very great while can an import be promoted to "La Dolce Vita" dimensions. In other words: it's not smart to ask for an arm and a leg when making a deal for U.S. release.

When British pix, including those made-in-Britain U.S. major company films which qualify for Eady money, are added to the overall 1962 record, the VARIETY survey shows that 940 offshore films last year earned $40,427,611 in the domestic U.S. market. This is a spectacular decline from 1961, when 942 pix brought in $60,170,045. However, as pointed out in

An All-Colossal Updated 'Hollywood' Via Merger of Studios at Malibu

By ABEL GREEN

When 20th-Fox prexy Darryl F. Zanuck and MGM ditto Robert H. O'Brien meet Columbia Pictures president Abe Schneider in London today or tomorrow (Thurs.) at the latter's Claridges Hotel suite they will continue the talks begun in Hollywood anent exploratory negotiations for a supercolossal, "21st century"-type of motion picture and television production studio to be built at the Century Ranch in Malibu, Calif.

The immediate end result of such a common pooling of production facilities among these three majors would be:

(1.) Realestate cash into the many millions for each of their high-priced present studio facilities;

(2.) A vivid dramatization that Hollywood, more than ever, remains the motion picture (and tv) production capital of the world, with expanded facilities not only for any and all American producers, but for global independent or corporate filmmakers;

(3.) A leveling-up and streamlining, with ultramodern automation advances, which will give the world's motion picture producers the ultimate in studio technical facilities.

Films of Mayhem From Many Lands Unreel at Cannes

Cannes, May 7.

Cannes Film Festival, 16th year, seems strong on the theme of violence this time. In past years it's been psychological aberration, erotic whimsy, depravity in Roman society as per Italy's "La Dolce Vita" or the ingratitude of beggars as in Spain's "Viridiana". The present, May 7-23, session opens with Alfred Hitchcock's people-pecking villains, "The Birds". Then, from America, too, comes Bette Davis in "Whatever Happened To Baby Jane?" as a theatrical brat 40 years later, poisoned by frustrated vanity, terrorizing her chair-ridden sister and hammering a maid to death.

Screen Writers Cut Up the Industry (And Selves); Bright 15th Annl Show

By DAVE KAUFMAN

Hollywood, May 7.

Joseph L. Mankiewicz won the Laurel Award for Achievement and Allen Rivkin the Valentine Davies Award last night (Tues.) before SRO crowd of 1,200 industryites attending the writers' 15th annual Screen Awards dinner at the Beverlilton.

Nate Monaster and Stanley Shapiro took the "best-written American comedy" award with their original screenplay, "That Touch of Mink," a Universal film. Horton Foote won the "best-written American drama" award for his screenplay, "To Kill a Mockingbird," adapted from Harper Lee's Pulitzer Prize novel ("Mockingbird" is also a Universal picture. Marion Hargrove won the award for "best-written American musical" for his script, "The Music Man," Warner Bros. filmusical from the play by Meredith Willson based on a story by Willson and Franklin Lacey.

Laurel Award presented to Mankiewicz is given yearly to the Guild member "who has advanced the literature of the motion picture through the years and has made outstanding contributions to the profession of the screenwriter." Award was presented to Mankiewicz by screen brother Joseph Lee Mankie, himself a Laurel winner in 1958. Mankiewicz, point screenplay scripter for 20th-Fox's "Cleopatra," has among his screen credits such pix as "All About Eve," "Guys and Dolls," "A Letter to Three Wives," "The Keys to the Kingdom."

Equity's 50th Anni Show OK But Could Have Been Even More Significant

The Actors Equity Golden Anniversary Show at the Majestic Theatre, N.Y., Sunday night (5) was a fine evening's entertainment although falling wide of the mark as a commemorative of 50 years of legit theatre history. Individual segments ranged from satisfactory to smash, but the program failed to convey the excitement of a half-century of dramatic activity.

A letdown, in view of the nature of the event, was the absence of many top performers, as well as the omission of more significant historical highlights than some of those presented. However, considering that she didn't have a headstart at her disposal for this volunteer venture, producer Jean Dalrymple did well in recruiting per-

Bedded Past 7 Years Woody Guthrie to Cut Big Folkniks Playfest

Woody Guthrie, folksong writer who has been laid up at Brooklyn State Hospital for the past seven years with Parkinson's disease and sundry other ailments, is due for a big spread from the folkniks currently on the club-concert scene.

Before his hospitalization, Guthrie left a flock of tapes of new songs with music publisher Howie Richmond who has since programmed them to lead sheets. The Richmond office figures there are about 100 of these songs that have been sent out to the current crop of folksingers who've been waiting for new Guthrie songs. The songs will be published in Richmond's Ludlow and Folkways firms. In addition, Richmond is prepping publication of a 265-page book containing the Guthrie catalog.

Guthrie, who is in his late 40s, is credited with such songs as "So Long It's Been Good To Know You," "This Land Is Your Land," "Pastures Of Plenty" and "Hills Of Oklahoma."

CBS' 250G For Fonteyn-Nureyev

London, May 7.

British Home Entertainment, the company formed in 1960 to operate a pay tv service in Britain, says it received a record fee from CBS for its Margot Fonteyn-Rudolph Nureyev program featuring "Aurora's wedding" and "Les Sylphides." The company says CBS paid $250,000 for the hourlong show.

Although the feature will go out on CBS later this year, it will not be shown in Britain until a pay tv service is inaugurated in 1964. The program was produced by Anthony Havelock-Allan and directed by Anthony Asquith.

'Variety' First Film Reviewer

Milwaukee.

Editor, VARIETY:

In VARIETY's obituary of Boyd Martin, the Louisville Courier-Journal critic, a headline proclaims that Martin was the "first" film reviewer in this country, claiming the distinction of writing, in 1910, the first film review in the U.S., that of "The Great Train Robbery", an Edison flicker that was already seven years old at the time the review was published.

Surprising that this statement should have appeared in VARIETY's as the first signed and published film review in this country was written by VARIETY's own founder and editor, Sime Silverman. Sime's review of a 7-minute Pathe comedy, "An Exciting Honeymoon", appeared in VARIETY's for Jan. 10, 1907, p. 9, and was republished in toto in VARIETY's 25th Anniversary number dated Dec. 31, 1920, p. 16. VARIETY's film reviews, in fact, appeared even before a trade press existed, the Chalmers 'Moving Picture World' (founded March 8, 1907) being the first periodical worthy of being called a trade organ rather than a house or company weekly publicity release.

In June 1908 the N.Y. Dramatic Mirror inaugurated a regular department of film reviews and criti-

VET AGENT KEN LATER MISSING MYSTERIOUSLY

Veteran agent Kenneth Later is the subject of a nationwide search by New York and Federal authorities following mysterious disappearance from his New York apartment about a month ago. His absence was noted by his friend and attorney Chauncey Olman who reported the matter to the Missing Persons Bureau.

Police inspected Later's apartment where they noted that all his possessions were in order and there was no sign that he contemplated a trip. Luggage and clothing as well as jewelry were still in the apartment.

Later had been with the William Morris Agency and MCA before going into business for himself. He switched about a year ago, to the operation of a Wall St. brokerage, but recently decided to return to show biz.

Irving Berlin Music An Exception to European Resistance—Bob O'Brien

The way Robert M. O'Brien figures it, the boxoffice roadblocks which many American musicals face in the overseas markets disappear when the Yank tuner is via Irving Berlin. Thus the Metro president has no trepidations about the upcoming "Say It With Music," Berlin cavalcade to be produced by Arthur Freed and directed by Vincente Minelli.

"Berlin's music knows no international barriers," stated O'Brien and it doesn't matter whether the marketplace is Rome, Tokyo, South America or wherever. "He sells all around the world."

O'Brien cited several Berlin filmusicals which have moved well both domestically and abroad, foremost among them being "White Christmas," thus there's sufficient evidence on which to base hopes for "Say It."

Part that the usual run of Hollywood tuners run into b.o. trouble o'seas is further established in the decision to adapt "Irma La Douce" as a straight pic, sans music.

Segregation Issue May Determine Legion's Conv.

Whether the American Legion's national convention will be held in New Orleans next fall, as it would like, depends on repeal of a Louisiana statute against Negro guests in hotels and motels patronized by whites. A test case in N.O. will clarify what the Legion believes an unconstitutional regulation.

Repeal of the local state law will open the doors not only for colored ex-GI members of the Legion but will put a new complexion on integrated show biz in the bayou state.

Washington, May 7.

New York was darkly portrayed as a "dead" city, its hotels on the "precipice of bankruptcy," its citizens and tourists afraid to spend money and its whole economy seriously imperilled.

The black brush was swept across Washington by a delegation of Gotham restaurateurs, hotel owners and labor leaders.

The cause of despair was the Internal Revenue Service expense account regulations. The New York delegation, including Vincent Sardi, Jr., Jerry Berns ("21" Club) and Toots Shor, told a Washington press conference the sad tale of their city. The meet was in connection with the Chamber of Commerce convention.

The only hope for salvation the New Yorkers said, was either repeal of the regulations or a new tax bill from Congress.

The confusion over the regulations is as much the cause of their troubles as the rules themselves, the group said.

Businessmen, both homegrown and visiting, are afraid to spend money at eateries and restaurants because of the IRS inspired confusion. "Accountants are running American businesses these days," said Toots Shor.

"I think the President should say 'Let's go back to the old way of living and let's be happy again'," Shor continued.

Jerry Berns said the 7% drop in "21's" business is wholly attributable to the new deduction rules.

Correspondents' Bash A Real Fun Night With JFK & Bishop as Toppers

Washington, May 7.

After skipping it last year, President Kennedy was back at the Radio and Television Correspondents' Assn. dinner this time, and he had an observation:

"I note in the program that the first president of your association was Fulton Lewis Jr. Tonight you are installing as president Bill Monroe (head of NBC News in D. C.). I'd say we've got this country moving again."

The President's speech, a brief one, was the only one in an evening devoted to entertainment.

Jerry Bishop, as emcee, had a fast run of gags which went over big with the crowd. He avoided political subjects. "I'd like to be clever," he observed, "but I have such a long list of 'don't's'."

He stuck to general humor, such as his childhood poverty. "When it snowed in Philadelphia when I

BRITISH CREWS NEED SPEED

Paramount's Production Stake

While Paramount's inventories dropped about $5,000,000 from the end of 1961 to the end of 1962, as reported last week, the company shows a marked increase in its book entry for productions in process. This item is carried at $17,220,000 at the close of the new period, compared with $11,117,000 the year previous.

However, there's a substantial falloff in costs of unreleased backlog. Films completed but not yet sent to market amounted to $5,513,000 at the end of 1962, compared with $18,174,000 at the end of 1961.

Par amortizes its own and outside production on the basis of 50% of the costs of a picture within 13 weeks after domestic release, 85% within 52 weeks and all but a small residual amount within 104 weeks. The residual amount is in partial recognition of future income from television.

On another front of Par's fiscal picture, company itemizes its research and development costs, deferred, at $4,270,000 for a color television (Lawrence) tube, and $8,726,000 applicable to pay television facilities.

Current research-development is charged to expense as incurred, and previously deferred balances are being amortized over 10 years. The amortization started in 1961 for pay television (Par owns International Telemeter) and in 1962 for color tube costs. If the previous policy of deferring color tube expenditures (after tax considerations) have been followed in 1962, the corporation's net loss for 1962 would have been $600,000 less than the officially reported $3,616,000.

Busy Everywhere Else, So Britain, Too, Looms Large In Seven Arts Production

Seven Arts, which recently has been stressing its many commitments in current and upcoming stateside production, apparently is not cutting down on its British production activity either. INdie production company will have a minimum of six pictures either in production or active preparation in Britain within the next 12 months—and that does not include the currently filming in Ireland "Of Human Bondage."

Before departing New York for his London base last week, Seven Arts veep Kenneth Hyman also reported the company "fully intends" to enter the local production scene in France and Italy, "and not just for economic reasons" which might be dictated by tax, subsidy benefits, etc. Seven Arts' invasion of the continent will, rather, follow the choices of scripts to be shot—the implication being that 7A will not, as some producers in the past obviously have done, set out to seek scripts just to move onto the continent. All such continental productions, though they be of local nationality, will be of "international appeal," including appeal for the States. That is in reference to the continental production investments of various U. S. majors in low-budget pix, designed primarily for the local market and special territorial handling elsewhere. Seven Arts, Hyman points out, does not have a worldwide distribution arm to feed.

'King of Paris'

Most likely to establish 7A's continental beachhead is the projected production, either late this year or early next, of "The King of Paris," to be directed by this year's Oscar-winning French director Serge ("Sundays and Cybele") Bourguignon. Film will be made in France as a French production, by a locally incorporated Bourguignon-7A company.

Seven Arts' British upcoming production slate includes "The Wild Affair," starring Nancy Kwan, directed by John Krish, for Bryanston-Seven Arts. Also "Conspiracy of Silence," which Hyman himself will produce and for which Ivan Moffat is currently writing the script; "Decline and Fall," an updated film adaptation of Evelyn Waugh's satiric, 1928-ish novel; "I Love Money" (tentative title), a comedy which will probably star Tony Randall and Robert Morley; "The Amorous Ghost," to be directed by Phil Leacock; "Uncle Edward," to be directed by Sandy Mackendrick, and, possibly, John Huston's "The Lonely Passion of Judith Hearne." The latter depends on when Huston completes directing 7A's "Night of The Iguana," which starts shooting on Mexican locations this September.

None of these pix has been definitely committed yet to any of the various U. S. major distribs with which 7A has production

Jack Rose Off to Rome To Whip Up New Scripts

Jack Rose left New York, Friday (3), for Rome, where he intends to closet himself with a typewriter and turn out new film scripts. The producer-writer, while making with the press in the Italian capital, will nonetheless make his future pictures in America.

Rose will take a hiatus from the inditing chores in June for the editing and scoring of his newest, "Who's Been Sleeping in My Bed?" in Hollywood. This is for Paramount and he has one more to go under his contract with this studio.

Disney's Big Sked: 12 at $24-26-Mil

Walt Disney Productions in 1963 figures to have its biggest filmmaking year in history. According to the present blueprint, company in the full calendar semester will turn out 12 features on an investment of between $24,000,000 and $26,000,000.

Only one is to be an animated feature, this being "Sword and the Stone."

Disney for the current year has eight features including two reissues, and all will be profitable, states president Roy Disney.

Distributor is Disney's own Buena Vista, headed by Irving Ludwig.

Company for the six months ended March 30 had a profit of $1,726,000, or $1.68 per common share, compared with $1,674,894, or $1.45 per share of common, for the like period a year previous. Film rentals fell from $20,971,486 to $17,881,189, while television income rose from $2,629,314 in 1962 to $4,269,695 in the six months of 1963.

Disneyland and other income also were on the increase. Total income for the six months of 1963 amounted to $22,241,884, compared with $22,643,201 in the 1962 half.

'Sundays & Cybele' In Honolulu as $5 Benefit

Honolulu, May 7.

Isle premiere of "Sundays and Cybele" (Davis-Royal) will be a $5 ticket benefit for Alliance Francaise, Honolulu French culture association.

Benefit will be held May 23 in the Queen Theatre, with $4 of each ticket earmarked for the French group's scholarship fund.

OTHERWISE GOOD AS HOLLYWOOD

By EDDIE KALISH

"In Hollywood there's a trend to throw us in the obituary column while in Europe the trend is to throw us on the front page."

That's the way producer Ross Hunter sums up his feelings about the international attitude toward Yank filmmakers. He's currently lensing "The Chalk Garden" in England and reported during a New York visit last week that British producers in particular are most interested in a "hands across the sea" trading of ideas on all phases of film production.

"The Europeans are trying to erase the word 'runaway'," Hunter said. "British producers, directors and technicians would like very much to come to the States to work and learn. They want to make comercial pictures that also have the qualities they have always had in their pictures and they are very interested in finding out what they can do to make these films," he reported.

Direct indication of this was given the producer on several occasions during the work on "Chalk Garden," he noted. For one thing, studio heads from Shepperton, Pinewood, as well as MGM Elstree where the film is being lensed, contacted Hunter and met with him to ask what if anything they could do to facilitate his production. They have been frequent observers on the set as well and Hunter said he has been getting excellent cooperation from all film production factions for the filming.

"They want to learn our methods," he opined, "but the British crews are equal to ours, maybe even better. If they lack anything, they lack speed," said the producer who brought no Yank technicians over for the lensing. So impressed with the British attitude is Hunter, in fact, that he said he would like to go back to England to make more films but he doesn't know if he'll be able to in the near future. He has a year left on his contract with Universal Pictures, for whom "Chalk Garden" is being made, and isn't decided on whether he'll renew after the pact expires.

As far as why he went there in the first place to make the picture, Hunter recalled that he was reluctant at first. "But when you make a picture like 'Chalk Garden,' you have to consider its negative cost. The main reason for the London trip was casting insurance. I wanted a cast that would appeal to the broadest possible audience and the people I wanted were mostly commited to England. I

Robert Rossen Dislikes Censorship, But Would Regret Its Non-Existence

"I don't like censorship but I don't like the absence of it," commented producer-director Robert Rossen prior to leaving New York over the weekend for Maryland and the start of "Lilith." He pays tribute to both the industry's own Production Code and the Legion of Decency for constructive work in keeping producers in line.

The important thing is the producer's intent; "qualitative changes have taken place and the Legion has noted it." The audience of today is not the same as in the 1940s. Changes in social values and world understanding have taken place and "it's terribly important not to live in provincial areas," said the filmmaker.

"Lilith" cast is headed by Warren Beatty, Jean Seberg and Peter Fonda. Rossen is particularly pleased to have Beatty who, he says, "doesn't go for too much exposure, being devoted to his work." And he's not discouraged by criticism of Miss Seberg whom he regards as "a beautiful girl but not in the vacuous sense."

Three weeks of shooting in Maryland and Virginia are on the schedule.

Other Reasons, Not That Nude Scene, Cost Harvey His Spanish Co-Prod.; Metro Took Over His Interest

London, May 7.

Telephoning from Dublin, where he is now starring in "Of Human Bondage," Laurence Harvey challenges the VARIETY story (April 24) which implied that he lost his coproduction status in "Ceremony" because of nude sequences involving Sara Miles.

He declared that the nude scene was in the original script, and in the Spanish translation which was submitted to all the appropriate authorities and agreed and passed by them. It was not added as an afterthought, but was an integral part of the film and conditioned the subsequent behaviour of one of the principal characters. It was not a publicity gimmick and he could not be held responsible for the fact that the incident had been exploited by "unscrupulous people" and exploded around the world.

Harvey, who declared that he had done everything required by Spanish law, such as employing matching crews, intends that he lost his coproduction billing for another reason. His original deal with Jet Films fell through because his Spanish partner, Alfredo Matas, could not come up with the necessary coin, and as a consequence, Metro came up with a second deal.

He insists that he behaved impeccably throughout the entire production, and declared that he would not do anything to prejudice his chances of filming in Spain again, or for that matter, in any other country.

He was aware of the possibility that the Spanish authorities may have had a subsequent change of heart about the nude sequence, but if that was so, he had not heard about it, and had certainly not been advised. "I cannot sit here and enter to the changing scene," he commented.

Running in Fours

A fourth theatre, the RKO Albee in Brooklyn, has been added for the run of Samuel Bronston's "55 Days at Peking" in the New York area beginning May 29.

Previously set for the simultaneous premiere engagement were the Palace on Broadway, RKO 23d Street and Trans-Lux 85th Street.

Joe Bellfort To 20th in Foreign

Joseph Bellfort, general sales manager of National Screen Service since 1956, is resigning to join 20th-Fox as an executive in the foreign department. He'll headquarter in New York but expects to be working around the globe.

Prior to joining National Screen, Bellfort had been with RKO Pictures, serving as European general manager from 1949 through 1956. Exec had joined the RKO Service Corp. legal department in 1939, while still in school, transferring later to RKO Pictures. In 1946 he was sent to Paris as assistant to the European general manager.

Joined in Board Rap, Get Bounced by Film Editors Union: Todd

Hollywood, May 7.

Because he signed an affidavit charging 20 of the 25 members of the board of directors of IATSE Motion Picture Film Editors, Local 776, with abuse of office, the union's assistant business manager, Bill Todd, claims he was fired.

Ten members of the union, including three directors, signed the affidavit and presented it at the regular membership meeting of the local last Thursday (2). Ordinarily, 10 members of the board constitutes a quorum to handle any business at a meeting. But, inasmuch as 20 of the 25 members were charged with "malfeasance," not enough were left to form a quorum, thereby making it necessary for the complainants to submit their charges to IA pres Richard F. Walsh.

Asked the nature of the charges, Todd said that "as one of the deponents of the charges, I think it would be highly improper for me to discuss them. They had to do with some internal trouble that has been brewing in the local for some time." He also said that "after the affidavit had been presented at the meeting as a new business item, a motion was passed that, in view of my having

Paul Newman Narrates USIA Film Sur le Cuff

Washington, May 7.

Paul Newman will narrate a new U.S. Information Agency documentary film, "Bridge to the Barrios," telling the Alliance for Progress story. It was filmed earlier this year in Ecuador.

George Stevens, USIA motion pictures chief, revealed Newman agreed to do the voicing without a fee as a public service. The MGM studio donated use of its recording facilities, Stevens said.

Film is scheduled for theatrical release in Latin America this summer, and will be shown around the world later. It was directed for USIA by Bruce Herschensohn.

U.S. Eager Not to Get Egg on Its Handsome Face at Cannes Fest

Cannes, May 7.

Advance evidence suggests that the United States is determined to avoid any repetition at this festival of the nobody-in-charge fiasco at the Mar Del Plata Festival earlier in Argentina. It is thought, though not yet confirmed, that both the Motion Picture Export Assn. and the U.S. Information Agency have more funds.

Allen Rivkin, president of the Screen Writers Guild is here from Hollywood as its "ambassador" and Fred Granick is here from Paris to keep an MPEA eye on Uncle Sam's prestige. It's anticipated that George Stevens Jr., will show, too, on behalf of USIA. A complaint from Mar Del Plata was that neither the U.S. government or industry took responsibility. Whether later alibis that it was all latin manana on the part of Argentines has merit, nobody wants a repeat of that situation here.

George Skouras Ill

His personal physician trekked west to accompany George Skouras back to St. Luke's Hospital, N.Y., amid rumors of severe illness.

Hospital spokesman said it turned out to be only a minor kidney infection.

INDICT DET. 'PRINT PIRATE'

Grand jury in Detroit last week indicted localite John P. Brouillet on four counts of pirating from copyright infringement.

He is accused of leasing illegally obtained prints of Walt Disney's "Shaggy Dog." Sargoy & Stein, New York, are of counsel for the producer.

Tenure for Pub-Ad Chiefs Not What T'was in Mad-Glad Days

Time was when the ad-pub hierarchy in the film business represented so many immovable objects. "Andi" forces, such as there were, were resistable for years.

Thus it was that Howard Dietz helmed Metro since the time it first teamed with Goldwyn and Mayer, Charles Einfeld stayed on through the Vitagraph, First National and Warner Bros. evolution, later to become a mainstay at 20th-Fox, Harry Brand was Mr. Big for 20th in the west for more than one generation, The late Mort Blumenstock became the followup to Einfeld fixture at Warners, both east and west. Perry Lieber lasted through the Nat and Hughes ownership at RKO, and Nate Spingold called the turns at Columbia until his death a few years ago.

Others who left imprints include the late A P Waxman at WB and Gaumont-British, Murray Mehman at Paramount, where he's now eastern production head, the late Al Selig at Tiffany and Col, Ny Dunb at RKO, Maurice Bergman at U and Gabe York at 20th.

Changes have been numerous over the past few years. These reflect changes in management, personality conflicts, ambition on the part of office holders in search of bigger things, etc.

A major change for the ad-pub men today is the number of bosses they have. In the years ago they answered only to the higher-up vicepresidents and the president. Now in a very large sense just about every producer, with modern independent status has to be contended with.

In the last few months v.p. appointees went to two individuals, namely Martin Da at Paramount and Robert Ferguson at Columbia. Davis has the spot formerly occupied by Jerry Pickman who went on to become domestic sales head of Par, then a member of the defunct-before-living Enter-

Seven Arts to Spend $1,500,000 on 'Decline'

London, May 7.

Kenneth Hyman, veepee of Seven Arts, has announced that the company has tied up with Ivan Foxwell to film Evelyn Waugh's novel, "Decline and Fall."

The pic is budgeted at over $1,500,000. Noel Coward, James Mason, Mayley Mills, John Mills, Kenneth More, George Sanders and Richard Attenborough are among the actors who have been "talking with the producer."

Lardner First-Drafts 'Comins' for Preminger; 'Cardinal' Nears Finis

Having now completed all European production on "The Cardinal," producer-director Otto Preminger, his cast and crew last week passed through New York on their way to the Coast for a final week's lensing. The Columbia release has been rolling along precisely on schedule and Preminger expects to have prints ready by August, although the pic isn't slated for its world preem until December.

While final work is proceeding on "Cardinal," things are also working on other upcoming Preminger projects. Ring Lardner Jr.'s first draft for the filmization of Patrick Dennis' "Genius" tome has been completed and Preminger expects to put the project before the cameras by the end of January, 1964, in New York and Hawaii. This picture will be released by United Artists.

Also on the drawing boards for 1964, possibly summer or fall, is the film adaptation of James Bassett's book "Harm's Way." Wendell

'Cleo' Advances Total $15,250,000 to Date, Fox Tells Latin Staff

Mexico City, May 7.

Advance cash guarantees for "Cleopatra" to date total $15,250,000, 20th-Fox exec veepee Seymour Fox reported at the two-day "Cleo" merchandising convention here last week. Fox told the delegates from 12 Central and South American countries gathered here that he expects the total advance guarantees to exceed $20,000,000 by the time "Cleo" world premes at the New York Rivoli June 12.

It is planned the "Cleo" will have 30 Latin American openings this fall, following its mid-August debut at the Teatro Del Este in Caracas. In addition to the huge cash guarantees brought in by the film, Fox told delegates it will probably raise more money for charity than any other picture in industry history, with benefits expecting to raise about $20,000,000 via theatre parties.

Home office execs attending the meetings with Fox included Harold Rand, global publicity director; Manny Silverstone, exec with 20th-Fox International, and Karl Kaust, supervisor for Latin America and Far East.

JUNKET TO LAS VEGAS FOR SINATRA'S 'HORN'

Paramount took to the air this week in its promotion of "Come Blow Your Horn," Frank Sinatra starrer, junketing 100 press and radio-television reps to Las Vegas from both Coasts. London and Paris publications also represented.

TWA chartered jet left New York yesterday Monday (6) afternoon and returned yesterday. While en route west a preview of the film was presented via Dave Flexer's Inflight Motion Pictures. It was stressed this was not for review purposes, Par preferring to have the critics catch "Horn" on theatrical big screen.

Sinatra was host at the Sands, L. V. holding forth at press conference, reception, buffet dinner, entertainment program, etc.

Yesterday exhibs were brought into the act. Theatremen in 20 key cities held screenings of a Sinatra short detailing the merchandising campaign for "Horn."

New York Sound Track

Cannes Festival this time expects a goodly turnout of U. S. talent. Festivals are notorious for no-shows but at this writing these personages are expected at the French resort: Alfred Hitchcock, Tippi Hedren ("The Birds"), Gregory Peck and Harper Lee ("To Kill A Mockingbird"), Bette Davis ("What Ever Happened To Baby Jane?") Burt Lancaster ("The Leopard"), Allen Ullman for The Screen Writers Guild, producer Harold C. Stone, director Adolphus Mekas.

Before taking off for Cannes last week, Film Culture editor Jonas Mekas reported he is about halfway through shooting his "Secret Lives of Salvador Dali," a feature length documentary record of some of Dali's more bizarre pursuits around Big Town. Mekas is attending Cannes in a dual capacity as editor of Film Culture and as production assistant on brother Adolphus Mekas' "Hallelujah the Hills". . . Sam Frankel, proxy of Zenith International, named chairman for the third annual IFIDA awards dinner to be held here next January . . . "Yojimbo, the Bodyguard," English language version of Akira Kurosawa's "Yojimbo," is having its preem engagement at the Kimo, Kansas City, Seneca is distrib.

Ben Bodec, long with VARIETY staff (Chicago and New York offices) and for many years with Spencer Magazine, has joined the Gallagher Report, newsletter of the magazine and media professions.

"The great art of film acting," according to actor Rex Harrison, "is in listening, thinking and answering. The film actor must relax completely, forget there's a camera in front of him and just behave naturally." Harrison appeared with film critic Stanley Kauffmann on Channel 13's "The Art of Film." Need for relaxation doesn't mean the actor need not project, said Harrison. Indeed, "with the advent of big epic films, certainly in the case of 'Caesar and Cleopatra,' you've got to project just as much as you do in the theatre. When that big Todd-AO camera is focusing on you surrounded by an army of thousands, you've got to give a theatrical performance or you'll wind up looking like a little mouse."

George Weltner back from Madrid, where he and Sam Bronston talked "Circus," and Rome . . . A. C. Lyles producing "Invitation to a Hanging" for Paramount . . . Gilda de Rochefort in from Paris talking it up for "Lady in a Cage." Par added Loew's Metropolitan Theatre, Brooklyn, to list of debut-run theatres for "The Nut." Manhattan's Paramount and Coronet previously had bows set . . . Howard Minsky, president of Telemeter, back in town after a Coast quickie.

"Threepenny Opera," seen to make its Yank debut via Embassy Pictures, has copped the annual Federal Feature Film Award of the West German Government which includes a citation and a cash award of $50,000 . . . TelePrompter has posted to sell its Houghton, Mich., community antenna system to WGN-TV, Chi.

Dore Schary, in his role as national chairman of the B'nai B'rith's Anti-Defamation League, told the league's exec committee here Sunday (5) night that all white Americans must respond with greater understanding to the Negro community's "more forthright and urgent resentment over ever-broken hopes and promises."

UA (Detroit) publicist Howard Pearl off on his annual globetrot, this time confining himself to the Scandinavian countries and into some of the Iron Curtain capitals (Warsaw, Budapest, Prague) before sailing back June 18 on the SS Constitution from Capri.

S. Frederick Gronich, the Motion Picture Export Assn.'s Paris rep, returned there Saturday (4) after two weeks of conferences at the homeoffice . . . Add another name to the ever-growing list of talent being signed by the Mirisch Co.: producer-director Richard Quine, who'll make four for the company which releases via UA. First will go early next year.

Seven Arts veepee Ken Hyman has returned to his London headquarters . . . Bob Davis, one of the trio who made the Oscar-winning "Day of The Painter," has just published a new novel, "Apes On A Three Paper Bridge." As the title so plainly shows, it has to do with the shenanigans in a large yacht-building company . . . UA previews Bob Hope's "Call Me Bwana" at the Woods in Chicago on Memorial Day.

Walter Reade Jr. opens his new 600-seat Community Theatre, located in a shopping center near Camden, N. J. June 6. The circuit now numbers more than 40 theatres . . . Bill Brohn has returned to Montreal after a week of talking to New York distribs re having a U. S. entry at the upcoming Montreal film fest (Aug. 2-11). The Montreal affair, says Davies, makes not only big business and art news throughout Canada, but it has been largely responsible for ridding much of Quebec of what used to be a fearsome stranglehold by the censors.

Riley Gallagher signed as instrumentalist in the recording of Mel Wolfman's score for "The Cool World," Shirley Clarke's latest New York indie feature . . . Actress-comedienne Jonie Jackson, currently touring with Jimmy Durante's nightclub act, signed by producer Richard E. Lyons for Metro's upcoming "Mail Order Bride" . . . Joy Chapman, currently in "How To Succeed in Business Without Really Trying," makes her film debut in the indie "Diary Of A Bachelor," now filming in Hempstead, L. I.

Ken Hyman likes this title: "I Was On My Way Up The Amazon When I Met A Girl Who . . ." The only thing now is to find a screenplay to go with it.

Youth can be a problem. When Donna Edith Brown came into youthful producer Sam Spiegel's Dorchester Hotel suite in London for an interview prior to her signing for "Chalk Garden," she spied Hunter and inquired of him, "where's the producer?" Replied he, "I'm standing in for him; my father's in the next room" . . . How does one entertain a mob of over 2,000 Zulus in the evenings after they've put in a hard day's work as film actors? Why show them movies, of course, that's what coproducer Stanley Baker is doing for the native cast of his coproduction with Joe Levine and Paramount of "Zulu," currently lensing at Natal, South Africa.

Phil Gerard, Universal's eastern ad-pub director, left Gotham over the weekend for confabs in Hollywood with U studio execs. Meanwhile, Harold Lipton, the company's ad-pub v.p., was in New York late last week . . . Guy Hunt, Edward Emanuel, Ruben Schapiro and Robert Abel have been added to the Theatre Owners of Pennsylvania board . . . Richard Bernstein, both publicist and producer for Allied

Gala Selling Via Miracle

London, April 7.

A VARIETY story last week headlined "Miracle to Sell All Gala Product" has caused some misunderstanding in London. The deal made by Ken Rive, managing director of Gala Films, with Phil Kellmer of Miracle Films, means that the latter will be personally responsible for the physical selling of all Gala's product, but Gala remains as a separate sales and distribution entity, as indeed does Miracle Films.

Kellmer will be responsible to Rive under the new arrangement, which goes into effect towards the end of June. As stated in the original story this is an association of companies and is not in any way to be regarded as a merger.

Seven-Minute N.Y. Decca Meeting, Then One Prodding Re Profits

Consolidated net earnings for Decca Records for the first quarter of 1963 took a steep dip under the previous year's figure, distillery prez Milton R. Rackmil revealed at the annual stockholders meeting yesterday (Tues.). This was largely attributable to a sharp decline in earnings registered by subsidiary Universal Pictures (see separate story).

Decca's net earnings for the quarter ending March 30, 1963, were $262,611, equal to 20c on 1,327,404 common shares outstanding. This represents a hefty decline from the $2,136,888, equal to $1.66 on 1,288,701 outstanding shares the previous year. As he had explained in Universal's annual meeting earlier in the day, Rackmil noted that slippage was due mostly to the fact that the picture company had no big product in circulation during the first few months of the year.

The prez reiterated his earlier contention that second quarter earnings would be "big" and that "profits for the year (1963) will be better than last year." He commented further that "record business continues good and I'm looking for sizeable gains in the picture end."

The meeting was adjourned in a quick seven minutes after it began but Rackmil entertained a question after the closing which led to some heated comment trading between the prez and stockholder Nick Pappalas who charged that holders aren't getting their fair share of Decca earnings. Rackmil countered that the company had no intention of raising its divvy and said that "we need the earnings in the operation of the business."

The incumbent six board members were re-elected at the meeting, including Rackmil, Leonard W. Schneider, exec v.p.; Martin P. Salkin, v.p.; Albert A. Garthwaite, Harold I. Thorp and Samuel H. Vallance. After the meeting the board met and reelected the present officers to a second term.

215 Post-'48 U's To Seven Arts?

Seven Arts Associated appears to have the inside track in negotiations for the post-'48 library of Universal. Close-to-the-chest plays by both parties still are continuing and no inkling of price has filtered out as yet.

Other parties which have put in bids for the post-'48 Universals includes Independent Television Corp. (ITC). ABC Films also was reported to have expressed an interest in the pix. Current betting, though, is that Seven Arts Associated will land the 215 features.

'Cleo' Set for Spain

Barcelona, May 7.

Twentieth-Fox has firmed a deal to open "Cleopatra" here at the 1,600-seat Kursaal Theatre some time during the first two weeks of November. Contract is said to involve the "largest cash advance guarantee" ever paid in Spain—$400,000.

This is the first continental date on the pix to be announced.

Agnes Moorehead Set For July Israeli Tour

Agnes Moorehead has been invited to appear with her "one-woman show" at the Israel Festival of Arts. She'll be there by July 14 for a tour of four Israeli cities. Actress just completed work in "Who's Minding the Store?" at the Paramount.

Other artists who have appeared at the Israeli fest include Pablo Casals, Jascha Heifetz, Van Cliburn and John Gielgud.

U's Quarter Net Slides to 780G; Outlook Bright

Universal Pictures' first quarter net earnings for 1963 fell sharply from the previous year's figures, according to Milton R. Rackmil, U prez, at the company's annual stockholders meeting yesterday (Tues.). Figure for the current first quarter was $780,000, equal to 60c a common share, as opposed to $2,160,000 or $2.42 a share the previous year. Rackmil said this drop was because "we had nothing in release in that period."

In the quickie session which lasted barely 15 minutes, Rackmil predicted a better second quarter than 1962 for the present semester, with a sharp rise expected. He raved about current and upcoming product, noting hefty biz being done by "The Birds," "To Kill a Mockingbird" and "Ugly American." In answer to a query about further production plans, he commented, "We're hopefully looking for a greater number of pictures in the future" and also noted that there are many plans currently working in connection with the MCA affiliation, the benefits of which will show up soon.

As regards the sale of the company's 215 post-1948 features for distribution to tv, Rackmil said that Universal is negotiating actively with one unnamed company at present. He said that U is "close to a deal," expecting completion "in the reasonably near future." These pix were put on the market per consent decree order in early March at a bottom price of $21,-000,000 plus 50% of the rentals.

In answer to a question from the floor as to why Universal hasn't issued a stock divvy despite healthy finances, Rackmil said, "At the present time we have no intention of increasing the cash dividend or issuing a stock dividend."

All six incumbent board members were reelected at the meeting. They include Rackmil, Preston Davis, Albert A. Garthwaite, Budd Rogers, Harold I. Thorp, and Samuel H. Vallance.

At the board meeting immediately following the stockholders meeting, all U officers were reelected. Board also voted a quarter dividend of $1.0625 a share on the 4¼% cumulative preferred stock. It's payable June 1 to holders record May 17.

PAR'S PAY-SEE BRANCHING OUT

International Telemeter, Paramount-owned home toll system, is on the move in various directions.

Company, headed by Howard Minsky, is readying to swing into operations with pay tv in the Los Angeles area, including Santa Monica and Beverly Hills. Minsky was in L.A. last week at work on formation of the franchise setup. Couple of components are still to be brought in but it's known that nationally prominent individuals will be part of the operation.

Further, it was disclosed that Telemeter is well beyond the market survey stage in New York and Florida, as it is in California.

While the franchise operation is nearly set in L.A., Telemeter is "on the fringe" of issuing franchises in N.Y. and Florida.

Company last week realized its first major breakthrough in the states with its coinbox exhibition at home. The Southwest Telephone Co., which functions out of St. Louis, has agreed on terms with Midwest Video, Telemeter franchise holder, on providing Midwest Video with the all-important tele lines.

Telemeter, it appears, could be in competition with Home Entertainment Inc., which for long has mapped plans for a home toll run in Santa Monica. Home Entertainment reportedly has applied for SEC approval of a $3,000,000 stock issue but approval to date has been withheld.

Telemeter meanwhile is now in third year of operation in Etobicoke, Toronto.

Beat the Bushes For Toll Birds

Three governmental divisions are being pressed for reports on their feelings regarding tollvision by Congressman George Huddleston, one of the legislators currently fostering a bill to prohibit pay-tv.

He has contacted Oren Harris, chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, requesting departmental reports from the Bureau of the Budget, the Federal Communications Committee and the Dept. of Justice, all agencies which have indicated prior interest in the overall toll question. Harris had requested these reports last February but his committee has received none to date. He has now directed that copies of these reports, when presented, be forwarded to Huddleston who will hopefully use them in his anti-toll fight.

It is also understood that similar action will be instituted by Congressman Emanuel Celler, also the author of an anti-pay-tv bill. In previous congressional sessions, several bills along this line have been introduced but Huddleston's move is the first time that any member of Congress has sought departmental reports for the fight. Both the bills introduced by Huddleston and Celler are being pressed in the current congressional session.

Leader for April: Cinerama's 'West'; U's Ornithological Flight in 3, 4; 'David and Lisa' Holds Strong

By ABEL WEAR

VARIETY's regular weekly boxoffice reports are summarized each month, retrospectively. Based on an average of 24 key situations, the source data constitute an adequate sampling of current releases but are not, of course, fully "definitive." An index of relative grossing strength in the U.S.-Canada market this monthly reprise does not pretend to express total rentals.

With a lift from Easter Week and generally good business weather, the boxoffice climbed in April, according to VARIETY reports from key cities. However some of the new pictures premiered last month did not shape up as well as expected. But the four biggest grossing pix amassed a total gross of more than $8,600,000. Each of the four hit $1,600,000 or better in the keys reported to VARIETY.

"How the West Was Won" (MGM), a newcomer in April, was the champ grosser last month, with more than $1,740,000. Pic also held in first place nearly every week during the month, this hard-ticket film being big to hefty capacity in all keys.

"Lawrence of Arabia" (Col.), which had been in the No. 1 spot both February and March, slipped to second position despite the Oscars showered on it, the cast and the production crew. "The Birds" (U), a newcomer which was out in release only three weeks, captured third position being No. 1 two different weeks.

"To Kill a Mockingbird," also from Universal, copped fourth place, showing excellent sustained strength. The Gregory Peck starrer was a close second in March and fooled even the most optimistic exhibs by its continued b.o. potency. It, too, had a lift from Academy awards.

"Mutiny on Bounty" (MGM), fifth in March, again captured fifth spot. "Longest Day" (20th) moved up from the seventh position it held in March to sixth place, being helped apparently by some new openings on continuous run.

"White Stallions" (BV), a new entrant, copped seventh place. "Days of Wine and Roses" (WB) finished eighth. It won third money in March.

"David and Lisa" (Cont) again finished ninth, the same as in the preceding month. "Courtship of Eddie's Father" (MGM), which was eighth in March, was 10th in April.

"My Six Loves" (Par), a new entrant, wound up 11th despite its spottiness while "Critics' Choice" (WB), another newie, rounds out the Top 12. "Diners' Club" (Col), "Love Is a Ball" (UA), "Diamond Head" (Col), sixth in March, and "Sundays and Cybele" (Davis) are the runnerup pix in about that order. Last named was helped by being given an Oscar as the best foreign film. "Diners" and "Ball" are new entrants.

Both "Ugly American" (U) and "Bye Bye Birdie" (Col) loom as outstanding newcomers. "Ugly" was strong enough the final week in April to cop fourth place that session, indicating its potential. "Birdie," which has opened in only two major cities thus far, continues its torrid run in L.A. and has been hitting new records at the N.Y. Music Hall every succeeding week in its first four sessions. Pic registered an alltime high for the Hall in its second session.

"Free, White and 21" (AI) also shapes as a possible biggie based on its smash opening week in Detroit. "Mondo Cane" (Times), too, looms as a sock biz-getter predicated on its showings in N.Y. (2 houses) and L.A. Otherwise, newcomers which were just getting around as the past month ended are uneven at best.

However, "Critics' Choice" may be heard from additionally. It wound up 12th in monthly standings. Also, "The Balcony" (Cont) has displayed considerable promise on its first few engagements.

Martin Heller Legalizing Now at 20th-Fox HQ

Attorney Martin Heller, formerly with Metro, is joining the legal department of 20th-Fox. During his six years at Metro, Heller specialized in legal affairs pertaining to network tv and syndication.

Prior to Metro, he was associated with ABC-TV's business affairs department.

MCA Fellowships To Campus Scribes At 15 Colleges

MCA is setting up a system of fellowships in creative writing to be bestowed upon promising amateurs among the students attending 15 U.S. colleges and universities. Grants will cover a full year tuition plus living expenses. It is believed that the plan is mostly intended to facilitate graduate students making the transition to professionalism. Amount of money to go to the student is kept secret at present. But with 15 institutions already involved, and another 11 possible, a sizeable disbursement annually is in prospect. Plan starts operating next September.

"Promise" in play, screenplay or television script writing will be a decision made on faculty. Only the money, not the choosing, is MCA's.

Arrangements for fellowships have already been made by MCA with Stamford, Brandeis, U. of Michigan, New York U., Yale, Rutgers, U. of North Carolina, Carnegie Institute of Technology, Catholic U. of America, U. of Iowa, Northwestern, U. of Texas, U. of Wisconsin, Cornell and Sarah Lawrence College. In addition, talks are presently in progress with 11 other colleges and universities to establish similar fellowships in these institutions.

Commenting on the fellowships, Jules C. Stein, MCA board chairman, said: "It is our desire to encourage the development of new writers who can creatively contribute to the performing arts. After careful study as to the best method of lending such encouragement, we decided upon the granting of fellowships to deserving students in leading institutions of higher education."

MCA is now controlling owner of Decca Records and Universal Pictures. The latter organization has underway a talent development program of its own to stimulate young producers, directors, actors and writers. This plan calls for the production of "new horizon" pix which will be produced on modest budgets with dual purpose of placing additional "quality" pix on the market as well as giving new and as-yet-undeveloped talent a chance to work and develop before the public. No features have yet been projected for this plan but there have been several signings of talent by U in recent months, with some work in this area expected shortly.

Hud

Hombastic, effort-filled, contemporary western, but undodging themes put to shade hulk of audience. Commercial elements will control b.o. destiny.

Hollywood, April 30.

Paramount release of Martin Ritt-Irving Ravetch production, directed by the former. Stars Paul Newman, Melvyn Douglas, Patricia Neal, Brandon de Wilde. Screened in Beverly Hills, Calif., April 29, '63. Running time, 109 MINS.

Hud ..... Paul Newman
Homer Bannen ..... Melvyn Douglas
Alma ..... Patricia Neal
Lonnie ..... Brandon de Wilde
Jesse ..... Crahan Denton
Jose ..... Val Avery
Pete ..... Yvonne Craig
Jesse ..... George Petrie
Jethro ..... Sharyl Locke
Ray ..... Frank Maxwell

"Hud" is a near miss. A shame, since the Martin Ritt-Irving Ravetch production, eloquently directed by the former, is a film of considerable merit, with flashes of brilliance in both dramatic and histrionic execution.

Where "Hud" misfires and falls short of the mark is in its failure to filter its meaning and theme lucidly through its characters and story. This lack of clarity and dramatic neatness is likely to leave the bulk of the filmgoing audience somewhat bewildered. Many may leave the theatre with little more than a bitter aftertaste at apparently having spent almost two hours in the company of an unpleasant pivotal figure, instead of with the fresh philosophical thrust on the changing patterns and values of the contemporary American West that lurks just beneath the surface and in the shadow prints that only the more analytical customers will take away as a reward. Stripped of this lesson of insight and perception, the picture loses its taste, flavor and significance and ends on the naked values of its plot, and that, alas, is liable to be the superficial way it is received by too many people.

From a commercial standpoint, then, it is the prerequisite, rather than the artful, values of the Paramount release that figure to shape its boxoffice destiny. Word will probably get around of its earthy, uncompromising dialog and of the unorthodox nature of its "hero" and his unsavory obsessions and relationships. Much will be made of the sticker appealing sub-stance and technical attainments. A clever ad image that hints of intended artistic stature rather than many racy melodrama could lend its fortunes somewhat by encouraging the audience-to-be to be prepared to probe a little, not just come for pure escape and sensual stimulation.

The screenplay by Ravetch and Harriet Frank Jr., adapted from a novel by Larry McMurtry, tells a tale of the modern American West, of its evolution from the land of pioneer ethics, of people human gratifications unmotivated by greed, to the rangy real estate of chaffer, mercenary creatures who have inherited the rugged individualism of the early settlers, but not their souls, their morals or their principles. The new westerner is Hud (Paul Newman), nephew and son of old Homer Bannen (Melvyn Douglas), pioneer Texas Panhandler who defends his offspring with a passion that persists to his bitter end, after he has just witnessed the liquidation of his entire herd of cattle (hoof and mouth disease) and the attempt of his son to have him declared incompetent to run his ranch. In the end, Hud is left defiantly alone with his land, abandoned by his nephew (Brandon de Wilde), who finds himself unable to share or stomach any longer the selfish crassness of his uncle and sets out, a 20th century personification of the pioneer spirit, in pursuit of better things.

It is in the relationship of father and son that the film slips. It is never clear exactly why the old man harbors such a deep-rooted, irreversible grudge against his kid. True, the young man's character is shady and he is held responsible by his father for the accidental death of his older brother 15 years before, but it appears that Hud never received the authority confirmation and understanding that a boy would desperately have needed after such an incident. It is not enough to let it rest that he is, and always was, a no-good young punk. Audience sympathy thus tends at times to gravitate to Bannen, not Douglas, contrary to the creative design.

But the picture has a number of elements of distinction and reward. The four leading performances are excellent. Newman creates a virile, provocative figure as that enemy this critter. The characterization of old age are marvelously captured and employed by Douglas. Another fine performance is turned in by de Wilde, who seems, however, to be in a "decent younger brother" (or nephew) casting rut. Patricia Neal comes through with a rich and powerful performance as the housekeeper assaulted by Newman. Supporting work is quite competent.

Though its relative scarcity of plot or direct story thrust may bother more impatient filmgoers, the accounts is crammed with fresh, pungent dialog and colorfully stated observation. Director Ritt has gotten the most out of both script and cast. The scene of the mass extermination of the diseased cattle is especially provocative and unforgettable.

The textures, compositions and points-of-view of James Wong Howe's cinematography are often striking, and responsible for a number of indelible images. Art direction by Hal Pereira and Tambi Larsen, editing by Frank Bracht and sound by John Carter and John Williamson are all vital and noteworthy contributions, as is Elmer Bernstein's sensitive, plaintive and foreboding musical theme. The Slave Latest of the bulky Steve Reeves exports from Italy. Usual saturation entry.
(CINESCOPE-COLOR)

Hollywood, April 24.

Metro release of Titanus production. Stars Steve Reeves; with Jacqueline Sassard, Claudia Cardale, Claudia Gora, Ivo Garrani. Dino Mangano. Screened at Cinema Center, Screening Room, Calif., April 23, '63. Running time, 92 MINS.

Milone ..... Steve Reeves
Lucia ..... Jacqueline Sassard
Claudia ..... Claudia Cardale
Antea ..... Claudia Gora
Lucio Cornelio ..... Ivo Garrani
Nubar ..... Dino Mangano

"The Slave" is another muscle opus from Titanus, Italy's Hercmatic answer to Vic Tanny. With Steve Reeves in the title role as the son of Spartacus, the Metro release should make its presence felt briefly in the multiple-booking sphere into which these extravagantly produced escape-exploitation epics inevitably fall.

"The Slave," or son of Spartacus, as created by screenwriters Adriano Bolzoni, Bruno Corbucci and Giovanni Grimaldi, turns out, to and behold, to be a composite of three formerly serialized heroes of the American screen: Zorro, the Lone Ranger and Superman. The character is a Roman centurion of Caesar's Egyptian legions who, circa 48 B.C., abruptly discovers who he really is (the son of Kirk Douglas) and instigates a campaign to free the slaves.

On the one hand he plays the role of the loyal Roman, or Clark Kent in a toga. On the other, he slips out of uniform, into an iron mask (ergo, the Lone Ranger) and, with Superman-like industriousness, bruises and batters the hapless forces of the ambitious, treacherous Cramus (Claudio Gora) and his scheming henchman Venio (Jacques Sernas). After each skirmish, a sword-inscribed letter S (read backwards, Z for Zorro) keeps turning up in the palace of Cramus. Eventually, Steve-desirable Reeves is pardoned by Caesar and falls into a climactic clinch with Lois Lane (Gianna Maria Canale) as a narrator's voice portentiously concludes something about all of those who have fought for the rights of the oppressed being sons of Spartacus. Oh, yeah?

Gore galore bathes this production, particularly filmed in Egypt which about makes it the Italian equivalent of the Hollywood runaway. The acting is mostly athletic or mechanical, but that matches the concept, which is more popular mechanics and sports Illustrated than art. The large scale production was directed by Sergio Corbucci and sports some dexterous photography by Enzo Barboni, lavish art direction by Ottavio Scotti and a serpentine score by Piero Piccioni. Tammy And The Doctor
(COLOR)

Unimproved No. 1 in the opus.

Hollywood, April 30.

Universal release of Ross Hunter production. Stars Sandra Dee, Peter Fonda; features Macdonald Carey, Beulah Bondi, Margaret Lindsay. Directed by Harry Keller. Screenplay, Oscar Brodney, from characters created by Gwen Davis. Executive producer, Joseph Gershenson. Camera (Technicolor), Clifford Stine. Editor, Milton Carruth. Previewed at Fox Wilshire, Theatre, April 29, '63. Running time, 89 MINS.

Tammy Tremaine ..... Sandra Dee
Dr. Peter Tremaine ..... Peter Fonda
Dr. Lee Hunter ..... Macdonald Carey
Mrs. Tremaine ..... Beulah Bondi
Mrs. Hunter ..... Margaret Lindsay
Grant Tripp ..... Reginald Gardiner
Dr. Eve Hunter ..... Adam West
Wally Ray ..... Henry Calvin
Professor Potsnet ..... Rudolph Anders
Mrs. Potsnet ..... Alice Backes
Mr. Hunt ..... Robert Burton
Mrs. Hunt ..... Jill Jacobson
Mr. Sargent ..... Forrest Lewis
Mrs. Sargent ..... Florence MacMichael
Mr. Barnes ..... Charles Tyner
Mrs. Barnes ..... Ruth Warren

Only those most unwittingly and chronically smitten with the "Tammy" whammy are apt to appreciate this flimsy third installment in producer Ross Hunter's six-year-old considerations. Two years have passed since the last edition. Now titularee "Tammy" is in her sweetsixteen, and it appears that it will take more than Hunter's patented glamour elixir to rejuvenate her and delay, for Universal, the inevitable point of diminishing returns.

Oscar Brodney's screenplay is little more than a slight and limp variation of what has gone before. This time "Tammy" (Sandra Dee) enables her hayen downbeat digs and wings to L.A., where she hires on as nurse's aide to maintain vigil over her rich companion, Beulah Bondi, who's to undergo a serious operation. There she falls for handsome intern Peter Fonda and solves the problems of everyone in sight.

Miss Dee seems a bit too chic for a hick chick from Mississippi, but she carries on gamely, considering the pitfalls that confront her in the script. For example, asked if she'd like "to go to the Bowl?" Miss Dee must reply, "Bowl? I never heard it called that! But don't you worry. I'll go before I leave."

Peter Fonda, sprig of Henry who resembles a cross between his dad and Fred Astaire, makes his screen bow. It's an unfortunately inane role for a debut, and young Fonda responds, said to relate, with a self-consciously artificial performance. Others implicated prominently in the dumb proceedings, none much better than adequate, are Macdonald Carey, Miss Bondi, Margaret Lindsay, Reginald Gardiner and Adam West. Alice Pearce has a funny moment or two.

Harry Keller's direction doesn't add matters much. Russell Metty's photography has that glamorous Hunter sheen about it, but often it's a bit too dark to see the look of expression on some of the actor's faces. At least one scene seems inexplicably suspended by Milton Carruth's editing, but on the whole he's done a workmanlike job, as have art directors Alexander Golitzen and George Webb and composer Frank Skinner, among others who labored on the production. The original "Tammy" song by Jay Livingston and Ray Evans is revived, for no apparent reason. Debbie Reynolds, the original "Tammy," sang it better than her successor does. Tube.

The Very Edge
(BRITISH)

Some implausibilities in this—but it's mainly a smooth mother about the effect on the married life of a young matron twice assaulted by a sex maniac. Reasonable b.o. prospect.

London, April 30.

British Lion-Gaumont release through B.L.C. of a Raymond Stross production. Stars Richard Todd, Anne Heywood; features Nicole Maurey, Jack Hedley, Harry Locke, Jeremy Brett. Director Cyril Frankel. Screenplay by Elizabeth Jane Howard, based on original material by Vivian Cox. Lewis Gilbert, Stross executive. Bob Huke; editor. Max Benedict; music, David Lee. Previewed at Columbia Theatre, London. Running time, 98 MINS.

Tommy Lawrence ..... Anne Heywood
Geoffrey Lawrence ..... Richard Todd
Hallam ..... Jack Hedley
Marie ..... Nicole Maurey
Mr. Silver ..... Jeremy Brett
Chesshyre ..... Norman Shelley
Inspector Burton ..... William Lucas
Police Matron ..... Vivian Cox
Police Sergeant ..... Harry Locke
Constable ..... Vernon Greenlow

Maybe "The Very Edge" would have benefited by some sharper direction than the capable Cyril Frankel has given it. It emerges an interesting matter but it lacks the very edge of its title. Some fiddly moments of scriptwriting, both in dialog and action, show up at different times. Still, it should be a worthwhile b.o. prospect and the climax, though trite, offers some worthwhile nail-biting minutes for patrons. For Britain, the marquee value is okay, but the stars may need some handsell in the States.

Story has Anne Heywood, as an ex-model and happily married young wife of architect Richard Todd, pleasurably awaiting her first child. One day, in Todd's absence, a young sex maniac breaks into the house and assaults her. On the verge of a nervous breakdown she finds that she has lost her child and she bitterly turns against men, even rejecting her husband.

Understandably, though somewhat hurriedly, he turns to the warmth and understanding of his secretary (Nicole Maurey). Now the problem is, "Will the criminal strike again?" and life for Miss Heywood, sans her husband's affection, is a wretched affair. The man is caught, but escapes and the terror starts up all over again. Climax is a corny but tense cliffhanger. Needless to say, it brings Miss Heywood and Todd together again.

Acting throughout is sound, with the main burden falling on Miss Heywood who assumes the required emotions without overmuch strain. Todd's role is fairly colorless but well within the range of this actor. Miss Maurey also makes impact in a role which is always threatening to be more important than it is.

Among the supporting cast, Jack Hedley is a believable Scotland Yard man. The maniac is played by Jeremy Brett. It's a difficult role and Brett scores a near miss. At moments the performance loses the sinister menace that is essential.

Cyril Frankel's direction is assured though not over imaginative. Other technical credits are okay. Film stands up as a very useful entry at the wickets. Rich.

Il Diavolo
(The Devil)
(ITALIAN)

Rome, April 30.

Mino Beloncrossi production and release. Stars Alberto Sordi; features Georges Wilson, Franca Valeri, Alberto Bonucci, Gino Bramieri, Anna Charisse, Gianni Agus, Ugo Fangareggi, Nando Bruno. Directed by Gian Luigi Polidoro. Screenplay, Rodolfo Sonego, Polidoro. Camera, Aldo Tonti; editor, Eugenio Cantini. At Supercinema, Rome. Running time, 89 MINS.

Amedeo Pavoni ..... Alberto Sordi
Ottavio ..... Georges Wilson
Ottavio's wife ..... Franca Valeri
Ottavio's mother ..... Anna Charisse
Ottavio's father ..... Gianni Agus
Ottavio's brother ..... Ugo Fangareggi
Ottavio's sister ..... Nando Bruno
Ottavio's wife ..... Ville Crespi
Ottavio's wife ..... Lauretta Masiero

Vastly amusing and intelligently made pic with the Alberto Sordi name a surefire marquee value in Italy. Film has export value as well as some exploitable aspects for certain special foreign situations. As bitter-sweet spoof of certain Italian and/or Latin characteristics, it plays best in these areas. But others deserve a look-see as well on pic's quality and Sordi's amusing antics.

Practically an improvised and imaginatively elaborated chronicle of Sordi's recent trip to Sweden, he and his usual scripter Rodolfo Sonego, as well as director Gian Luig Polidoro, have come up with an almost consistently risible picture of various adventures lived by an Italian businessman on a Scandinavian trek. Accent, as in most Italian males' dreams of the north, is on the female of the species.

Sordi and his collaborators register in the more superficial and obvious aspects of pic, but manage as well to make some trenchant observations on the steps which separate Northern from Latin character and morality. As such, it is one of the more intelligent studies of the Italian male seen here in a long while.

To be sure, the haste with which pic was made shows in certain spots where improvisation and over-simplification lower the quality. Moreover, all things considered, it's a remarkable effort. Location lensing by Aldo Tonti captures Nordic local color while a large and animated as well as gravity and able cast recruited on the spot gives Sordi apt backing. Munk.

Black Zoo

Exploitable horror melter.

Hollywood, May 3.

Allied Artists release of Herman Cohen production. Stars Michael Gough, Jeanne Cooper, Rod Lauren, Virginia Grey, Jerome Cowan, Rhoda Cook, Warren Oates, Marshall Bell, Anne Curtis, Elaine Jones, Joel Fluellen, Ben Lane, Bonnie Harris, Arthur Batanides, Bob Burns, Robert Gardner, Michael M. Angel. Directed by Robert Gardner; screenplay, Herman Cohen, suggested by story by Robert Gardner; camera, Gilbert Warrenton; editor, Edward Mann; art director, Paul Dunlap; set decorator, Jerry Adams; music, Paul Dunlap. Previewed at Apollo, May 2, '63. Running time, 80 MINS.

Michael Conrad ..... Michael Gough
Ella Conrad ..... Jeanne Cooper
Jimmy ..... Rod Lauren
Jeffrey Stengel ..... Virginia Grey
Jerry ..... Jerome Cowan
Mary Mapes ..... Rhoda Cook
Father ..... Warren Oates
Frank ..... Marshall Bell
Art Student ..... Elaine Jones
Art Student ..... Joel Fluellen
Hospital Nurse ..... Ben Lane
Lt. Tom Rivers ..... Bonnie Harris
Cop ..... Arthur Batanides
Cop on Duty ..... Bob Burns
Coroner ..... Byron Morrow
Officer Benson ..... Michael M. Angel

Herman Cohen's production of "Black Zoo" is a resourcefully executed and highly exploitable claw-and-fang opera that figures to make its presence felt briefly but profitably in the circumambulations as a saturation-booking attraction. However, outside of its commercial values and cinematic know-how, there is little to recommend in the Allied Artists release for anyone but the indiscriminate sensation-seeker.

Elaborately violent and gory, the film is constructed on a thoroughly pop-Hitchcock story foundation. Pivotal figure of the screenplay by Cohen and Alan Kandel is the deranged proprietor (Michael Gough) of a private zoo who uses his big cats and gorillas to destroy those whom he deems his enemies. Gough belongs to a cult of animal worshippers who believe in soul transference, or continuity of animal life beyond death. He has little use for people other than as occasional sustenance for his caged beasts. When anyone comes prying into his affairs, Gough plays rough, promptly feeds him to the lions. Eventually he is destroyed by his own men, a mute (Rod Lauren), while his wife (Jeanne Cooper) and his beloved animal friends look on.

Gough is singularly unpleasant as the organ-playing madman. Competent performances are chipped in by Miss Cooper and Lauren in key roles, Virginia Grey, Jerome Cowan, Rhoda Cook and Warren Oates in smaller ones. Balance of human support is adequate, and the animals are extraordinarily cooperative under Robert Gardner's skilful direction. Number among the other specialties of the production are the cross in which Gough ushers a tiger, two lions, a black panther and a cougar into his parlor, seats them comfortably in easy chairs and proceeds to lull out a dreamy, sleep-inducing dirge on the organ for their listening enjoyment. It's the cats' pajamas.

Among valuable assists to the production are those of cameraman Floyd Crosby, editor Michael Luciano, art director William Glasgow and composer Paul Dunlap. Equally vital are the efforts of animal supervisor Ralph Helfer, special effects man Pat Dinga and the optical effects of the Howard Anderson Co. Tube.

Murder at the Gallop
(BRITISH)

Miss Marple, Agatha Christie's eccentric amateur sleuth, clears up another mystery. Margaret Rutherford and smooth cast.

London, May 1.

Metro release of a George H. Brown production. Stars Margaret Rutherford; features Robert Morley, Flora Robson, Stringer Davis, Charles Tingwell, Jean Kent, Robert Coote, Duncan Lamont, Michael Shepley, Gwendolyn Watts, Austin Trevor, Conrad Phillips, Joan Hickson, Andrew Cruickshank, Ron Goodwin, editor, Bert Bates. At Metro Private Theatre, London, May 1, '63. Running time, 91 MINS.

Miss Marple ..... Margaret Rutherford
Hector McHarg ..... Robert Morley
Miss Gladys ..... Flora Robson
Det. Sgt. Craddock ..... Charles Tingwell
Mr. Stringer ..... Stringer Davis
Inspector ..... Duncan Lamont
Richard Shaw ..... Austen Trevor
George Crossfield ..... Robert Coote
Raymond Shaw ..... Conrad Phillips
Sgt. Bacon ..... Gordon Rollo

Agatha Christie's creation, Miss Marple, the indefatigable amateur sleuth, provides another unpretentious whodunit skillfully tailored to talents of Margaret Rutherford.

TICKET TAKER-AWAYER: TV

Rules, Disproportionate Ratios Hamper Yank-Type Film Selling In Argentina, Marty Blau Finds

In Santiago, Chile, where the average admission price is about one-and-a-half cruzeiros, it takes approximately 22 admissions to cover the cost of a 100-line newspaper ad. Same 500 miles away in Buenos Aires, the same ad in an equivalent paper costs about 10,000 Argentine pesos and, figuring that the net after taxes on the 125-peso ticket is 88 pesos, it requires at least 120 tickets to cover its costs.

Example above is cited by Marty Blau, publicity manager for Columbia International, as typical of the high cost of advertising and publicity in the Argentine capital. Exec recently returned from a swing through Santiago and B.A. setting plans for the "Lawrence of Arabia" process. In comparison with B.A., says Blau, both Santiago and Mexico City are "reasonable." In the latter capital, the 100-line ad costs 140 Mexican pesos. At the 8 peso admish price, now allowed for the big negative specs, this comes out to 17 admissions; for the five peso theatre, to 25 tickets, and for the regular 4 peso theatre, to 35 tickets.

Making "reasonable" deals for tv spots on one of the four B.A. channels also proved difficult, Blau reports, even though all B.A. tv stations are reportedly in financial trouble with much unsold commercial time on their hands. Despite this, their prices are "entirely out of line."

Radio Short Rate

Most frustrating to the Col exec, however, was the situation with radio spots in B.A. The general format—the one Col has been using everywhere else—for the "Lawrence" radio blurbs has been a snatch of the background score, with a straight announcement about the upcoming date in the forefront. There is, however, in B.A. a regulation which says that a radio spot cannot blend music and straight pitch. It must be either the straight pitch, sans music, or an out-and-out singing commercial. Col unfortunately never quite got around to thinking up a "Lawrence" jingle when it was prepping the pic's campaign.

Another frustration to B.A. film men is the requirement that all stills and ad matter must be passed by the municipality — and that means approval first for the overall campaign, and then a return visit to the municipal authorities to have each individual still, etc. stamped "approved." Result: a film distrib almost needs one man working fulltime as liaison with the municipality.

One bright spot on the B.A. scene is free space in the newspapers: "they are really interested in film news." Free space also is available in the Santiago papers, though picture cuts must be bought.

Because of the huge public acceptance of dubbed-into-Spanish American tv shows wherever he went on this swing, Blau now wonders if the long accepted theory that Latins won't "buy" dubbed theatrical films might not now be outmoded. New generations of kids are growing up now who accept dubbed product without flinching, he says. However, he adds speculatively, it may be that the very audience which is now accepting dubbed tv fare so readily may also be the audience which has, in the last several years, become "lost" to theatres.

Kubrick Picks Pickens

London, May 7.

U.S. cowboy actor, Slim Pickens, has been chosen by director Stanley Kubrick to play the role of Texas H-bomber pilot in "Dr. Strangelove: Or How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb."

Peter Sellers, who was originally scheduled to do the part, was forced to cancel after he broke his ankle.

In Kingsley's Memory

All proceeds from the opening night of the new Peter Sellers' starrer, "Heavens Above," at the Sutton Theatre in New York May 20 will go to the Kingsley Scholarship Award Fund, set up last year in the memory of the late indie distrib, Edward L. Kingsley. Fund is designed to help young filmmakers complete their studies.

A special feature of the benefit performance (only) will be the screening of John Craddock's 11-minute short, "Arrivederci, Darling." Craddock, made the short last summer after having received the first award from the Kingsley Fund just a year ago. His new short is to be distributed by George Brent.

Wm. Shelton Exits Handling Art Pix

William Shelton, who has been chief exec of 20th-Fox's artie affiliate, International Classics, since its formation seven months ago, has resigned. It's understood that the resignation followed a disagreement between Shelton and 20th management on distribution methods to be employed in selling product.

First film to go out via International Classics is the Brigitte Bardot starrer, "Please, Not Now," which started its initial dates last month. According to Shelton, he was told that he could use neither the 20th domestic sales organization to handle the Legion of Decency - condemned pic, nor go through sub-distribs around the country (as most other indies do). Instead, he would have to book the picture out of his New York office and make personal trips to the key cities.

At the time of his resignation, picture has played five dates, with 120 bookings set up (with the aid of 20th's branch men) through the end of next month.

During his seven months with IC, exec also prepped the release of "The Battle," reedited version of Abel Gance's "Austerlitz," which was acquired, like "Only for Love," by the prior 20th management several years ago. No release plans for "Battle" have been set yet.

Shelton, whose background includes both indie distribution in this country and production in Europe, plans to return later this month to Paris, where he made his headquarters prior to taking the 20th assignment.

'Arabia' Advance Sale Working Out in France

Paris, May 7.

"Lawrence of Arabia" (Col) is continuing its stout boxoffice here. For one of the rare times, a system of advance ticket sales is working fairly well in one of the four houses now playing. And it is working in the theatre using the subtitled version. Film is not being tried at those projecting the dubbed French form.

As a rule, the French are notoriously against hardticket films, and rarely book very far ahead for legit. But at this Paris film house about 20% of the seats are reserved via a block that goes as a first-come, first-served affair.

This was tried with "Ben-Hur" (MGM) at the Gaumont-Palace a few years and worked moderately well. 20th-Fox is watching this as it prepares for a hard-thrust "Cleopatra" opening next season.

STORM SAME ALL OVER: DENTS B.O.

Milan, May 7.

The spring MIFED—Milan's film and tv film trade fair—was again the occasion for a summit meeting of motion picture chiefs and their reps for most world areas. Tone of the meeting was set by Eitel Monaco, head of Italy's ANICA as well as the all-encompassing Bureau International du Cinema (BIC), in his keynote speech. His message: film production is dropping all over the world and the individual governments must come to the aid of their industries.

Monaco dramatically pointed out that over 1,500,000,000 customers had been lost in recent years in Western Europe alone, while film production had dropped almost everywhere as well: The US, which had once averaged 500 features a year, was not putting out more 126 (48 of them in Europe), while Japan's total went down from 335 in 1961 to 275 in 1962; France feature production was down to 125 in '62 from previous year's 163; while W. Germany made 52 pix in 1962 as against 79 in 1961.

Italy was almost the sole exception, having produced more films in 1962 than in the previous year, but Monaco added that the local industry was not boasting over this achievement.

According to the ANICA chieftain, attendance was off 60% in Britain, 40% in Japan, and 11% in Italy during the past 7 years.

Government officials in several areas too often refused to listen to motion picture industry appeals, Monaco added, suggesting that in the future such appeals should be substituted by "apt and efficient action designed to rid the cinema of an oppressive fiscal burden and the illicit competition (from) television."

Plans for such action will be drawn up and coordinated by the B.I.C., which will then see that appropriate organizations in various world pic industries carry out pritest action.

Among industry toppers attending the BIC assembly and that of the FIADF (International Film Distributors Federation) both held during the last days of Milan's MIFED, were: Messrs. Brisson, Deutschmeister, Echarti, Figuera, and Roem for the producers; Messrs. Penotti, Schwaller, Agusti, Bauman, Chabert, Cianfaroni, Goeller, Mesquita, and Paduia for the Distribs; Messrs. Weil-Lorac, Claessens, and Roem for the Technical Industries; Messrs. Trichet, Gemini, Cilenti, Villa, Lopin, and Miedemafor the exhib sector; and Mrsars. Valignani and Giannelli for the B I C. Secretariat.

Leo Hochsletter, MPEA Mediterranean topper, likewise made the Milan assembly as an observer for the Yank contingent.

NIXON REPAIRS SWITCH 'ARABIA' TO FULTON

Pittsburgh, May 7.

"Lawrence of Arabia" will continue its interrupted run in Pittsburgh at the Fulton on Thursday (2) after it was determined that it will probably be eight weeks before the Nixon Theatre, which suffered smoke and water damage from a nearby cafe fire two weeks ago, will be ready.

When the Nixon is ready again, it will have the option of taking over the film again if owner Gabe Rubin feels it still has strength left.

Jack Tessler's Berth

Jack Tessler has been named assistant foreign publicity manager of United Artists, working under foreign publicity manager Samuel Cohen.

Tessler recently held publicity post in London, Rome and Tel-Aviv, and prior to that was associated with the international division of 20th-Fox.

Salem, N.H., May 7.

Eugene F. Gray, an operator of film theatres, doesn't lack diversified business interests despite the fact that he is 74 years old and his doctor has advised him that he should start slowing up a bit.

At the recent harness racing meet at Rockingham Park here, he had a stable of 80-odd race horses.

In addition, he operates more than 100 gasoline stations, a wholesale liquor distributorship, hotels, stores, automobile agencies and a wholesale oil business.

He is a resident of Walpole, N.H., and Bellows Falls, Vt.

Banca Del Lavoro Invests $1,600,000 In 30 Italo Negs

Rome, May 7.

Italy's Banca Nazionale del Lavoro has invested over $1,600,000 in 30 Italian features in the first four months of this year, it's reported here.

Money comes from Bank's Autonomous Credit Fund for Motion Pictures, and report is given as denial to local rumors that the Bianca del Lavoro had completely ceased to issue credit coin for local production, move which is said to have been made recently by most other Italo money sources. Local report also adds that the Banca del Lavoro will continue to issue credit after selection of appropriate projects has been made.

Specifically, however, statement is felt here to be a reply to recent open criticism of Bianca del Lavoro operations by producer Antonio Cervi, who blamed lack of Bank support for postponement of his project, "The Red Desert," which was to have been directed by Michelangelo Antonioni with a cast headed by Monica Vitti and Hardy Kruger. Pic has been postponed until the fall.

In his statement, Cervi also lashed out at fellow-producer Dino DeLaurentiis for alleged "unethical" statements on a television show in which DeLaurentiis implied he would never—at a cost of 500 Million Lire ($800,000)—produce a film by Antonioni.

Disney to Distrib Via Own Setup in France

Paris, May 7.

Walt Disney Productions here has taken on a sales manager, Jean Thomachot, who was recently with the French distrib company Cinedis. This is a move by Disney to do more of its own film handling which has usually been let out to other distribs on a percentage basis.

Oscar Lax, heading the Disney operation, says that the organization now will handle about 60% of its French film business, mainly in keys, with the remainder handed out to hinterland distribs on a sort of state's rights basis.

New setup will be extended to other Continental countries outside of France. Disney previously had a local deal with Athos Films, headed by Jo Siritzky, which split up over percentage agreements. Siritzky still has one pix to go before complete severance. Then the Disney operation will go into full swing.

Screen Publicists Guild has set a new two-year pact with Universal, following the pattern established in previous settlements recently with United Artists, Columbia, Warner Bros. and 20th Century-Fox. Contract grants reduction in tolerance overtime hours, increased job security, wage scale increases and pension fund payments.

New pact will be in effect until April 25, 1965. In it, weekend tolerance (overtime without pay) is eliminated by the beginning of the deal's second year and weekly tolerance hours are reduced from four-and-a-half to four hours. Also obtained is a.i increase to 105 days of notice in the event of layoffs resulting from job transfers.

Like the agreements with the other companies, a wage increase of $12 over the two years was obtained, as well as a $3.75 weekly pension payment by Universal, to begin January, 1965. This settlement leaves only Metro's pact with the Guild still outstanding and negotiations are currently in progress with that company. The union has a no contract-no work policy and it almost called a strike against Col, WB and Fox when the trio balked against its demands only to comply at deadline.

Guild is a local of District 15 of the AFL - CIO Retail, Wholesale and Department Store union, repping homeoffice praisers in most majors in Gotham.

Elsewhere on the labor front, talks are still bogged down between the Screen Directors International Guild and the Film Producers Assn. Former last week obtained strike authorization from its membership and is threatening to walkout should further talks fail. The next meeting between the two won't be until next week, however

B.O. Tax, Censors On COMPO Slate

Repeal of the Federal tax on theatre admissions and (2) film censorship will be among the topics of discussion at the meeting May 15 of the Congress of Motion Picture Organizations exec committee in New York.

A report of the COMPO committee working for an end to the Federal admissions tax will be made by LaMar Sarra, representing Theatre Owners of America and cochairman of the committee. Also scheduled is a report by T. Manning Clagett on the present status of censorship legislation in the various states and Charles E. McCarthy, COMPO's exec v.p., will discuss the proposal to revive the organization's Audience Awards which were once given to actors, producers etc. in various categories like the Academy Awards with the difference that COMPO's kudos

ROGERS PILGRIMAGE CHANGES STOPOVER

Annual show business (mainly film industry) pilgrimage to the Will Rogers Hospital and O'Donnell Memorial will be without one of its familiar-of-past highlights. This is the stay at Herman Robbins' Edgewater Beach Motel, Schroon Lake, N.Y., with its elaborate accommodations for 200 persons, which the National Screen Service topman decided to keep shuttered this year.

At Robbins' suggestion, the board shifted the bivouac to White Face Inn, Lake Placid.

Participants in the regular Rogers board meet and hospital inspection tour will leave Manhattan for upstate June 27, which is a Thursday, via chartered bus and return as they desire either Saturday or Sunday.

Columbia Withdraws Anti-Red Film Theatrically — Messenger Carrying Negative Murdered in Ecuador

Following a series of disturbances in diverse corners of the world where Columbia Pictures had playdated its anti-Communistic documentary, "We'll Bury You," the company has withdrawn it from theatrical exhibition. The assassination in Quito, Ecuador, recently where rabid Communists killed a messenger for a local theatre who was carrying the film print accelerated the decision.

Apart from the fact that it has had "poor boxoffice reception," according to Col's international topper Mo Rothman, the local irritations have been such as to not make it wise to bother with the film. Instead it will be consigned to 16m showings, schools, educational groups and the like. The incidence of stenchbombs, slashed seats, bombardment of screens by partisan patrons has automatically cooled exhib interest in the documentary titled with Khrushchev's now notorious warning to the West.

As regards the tragic fate of the Ecuadoran theatre attache, the local Film Row, sparked by Columbia and the exhibitor there, is staging a benefit for his family.

Film was made at $200,000-$300,000 cost by Jack Leewood who sold it outright to Columbia which felt it had a topical exploitation film potential perhaps approaching its click a couple of years ago with the Swedish-made Hitler reprise, "Mein Kampf."

Reade Acquires Arcadia's Dozen

Walter Reade Theatres, an arm of the Walter Reade-Sterling combine which embraces distribution-coproduction, tv production-distribution as well as exhibition, has acquired the 12-theatre Arcadia Theatre Circuit on the northern New Jersey shore Reade has taken over immediate operation of the theatres, which include 10 conventional houses and two drive-ins, all located near Reade-Sterling's exec offices in Mayfair, N.J. Theatres were acquired from Lee J. Newberry.

With his latest acquisition, Reade has acquired 15 theatres since last December, with two more slated for late this spring (the new Cherry Hill near Camden, N.J. and summer (the new 34th Street East, Manhattan).

Dubbed Dassin Film 'B'-Rated But Levine's Original Gets the 'C'

Jules Dassin's Italo-made "The Law," originally presented in this country by Joe Levine via Metro in a dubbed English version called "Where The Hot Wind Blows," has had its Legion of Decency rating changed from B (morally objectionable in part for all) to C (condemned), with its reissue in its original, uncut subtitled version.

The new release, going out via Levine's Embassy Pictures, has reverted to the original title. Legion comments that this uncut version "exhibits a constant emphasis upon grossly suggestive costuming and situations and contains one sequence which is thinly disguised pornography." (This makes three condemned pictures in a row to come from Dassin—the others being the highly successful "Never on Sunday" and "Phaedra," both of which were Lopert releases.)

Metro dropped "Twilight of Honor" title for new William Perlberg-George Seaton production, which will be filmed sans the novel's title until a final tag can be found.

New Trial for Guard Who Shot Extra in Bus Fuss

Santa Monica, Cal., May 7.

New trial of Vance Boyd, special William J. Burns guard charged with assault with intent to commit murder following a shooting incident last Nov. 27 at Revue-Universal Studios, has been set for May 20, after a hung jury couldn't agree on a verdict and voted nine-to-three for acquittal last week (1). District Attorney's Office meanwhile will determine whether to retry or dismiss the case.

Boyd was arrested after he accidentally shot one film extra Allan Salin, through the chest after an argument over latter boarding a bus against orders on studio backlot to return to studio front gate. Five other extras also were wounded in the legs by flying fragments of concrete and blacktop when guard fired two shots into the pavement before later allegedly shooting Salin, who has recovered.

Lebedoff: London And Armstrong Pollyanna Pair

Minneapolis, May 7.

When they were here last week to speak at the North Central Allied unit's national convention, national Allied States president Jack Armstrong and executive director Milton London found Martin Lebedoff, NCA president, in anything but a cheerful frame of mind.

Armstrong and London were exuding optimism over exhibition's future despite current pressing problems. But that didn't keep Lebedoff from telling them that, in his opinion, "If Allied States wants to display real hardboiled integrity it will advise small exhibitors to close their theatres instead of continuing to hang on."

"Most people who formerly comprised small-town and many neighborhood subsequent-run theatres' patrons have moved away from the showhouses into their home living rooms where they get their movie and other entertainment free from their television sets, and they can't be won back," Lebedoff told the national body's heads.

"It's a cinch there'll be more and more theatre deserters. The situation for the little exhibitors is sure to worsen. The smart thing for him to do now, without further delay, is to try to sell his theatre building for other use or to convert it into some kind of store room for himself.

"What's making matters worse for the little exhibitors, of course, in this territory and probably everywhere else, is the better and newer film fare tv now is giving setowners. The right thing to do is for industry leaders to tell these small theatreowners to quit because there's no hope for them."

Armstrong answered that he's confident, too, that this problem will be worked out in a manner satisfactory to exhibitors because what's happening is hurting the film companies also and they will help to find a solution.

Lebedoff also pointed out to Armstrong and London that most small exhibitors have been compelled to engage in other businesses or occupations to augment their incomes so they can eke out a living. Except for the fact he lately acquired two prosperous restaurants, he himself would be experiencing plenty of financial difficulty inasmuch as his neighborhood theatre now nets little or nothing, he said.

JP Miller, who scripted "Days of Wine and Roses," to enter indie production with purchase of George Garrett novel, "Which Ones Are the Enemy?"

ABOAF REPORT ON CONTINENT

Italy is the new key for profits in the European film market, at least for Universal, the company's veep and foreign general manager Americo Aboaf repot : following his recent globe-circling tour. Despite the fact that the new year is barely four months old, the exec predicted that Universal's Italo grosses in 1963 will be up at least 35% over last year.

In fact, says Aboaf, Italy, which formerly ruled after Britain and France as a money market for U.S. films, is now running neck-and-neck with Britain. As in many other territories, he reports, total boxoffice receipts (that is, on all films) may be down, but the U. S. share of that total pie is increasing, and U's share of the American share is, in turn, way up.

Concerning the "period of adjustment" which the Italo production industry is now experiencing (and the possibility that a smaller Italo production shed will mean more and more profitable dates for the U. S.), Aboaf will only say that anything which helps put the Italian industry on a firmer footing will, in the long run, be better for all distribs, including the Americans.

In a way, Universal's big Italo upheat may be seen as symbolic of the rapid strides which the company has been making throughout the overseas market in the last several years. And, according to Aboaf, these things just didn't happen by chance. First off, there were the big b.o. pictures, starting back in the pre-"Pillow Talk" days. Of equal importance, however, says the veep, was the vast reorganization of the company's overseas distribution setup which, according to one estimate, has cut the costs of overseas distribution in half.

In the radical reorganization of the overseas arm, Universal went from a company which operated almost entirely via its own system of branch offices, to the company which today services over half of its markets via local distribs or "commissioned agents." A typical situation was Italy, where, until four years ago, the company had maintained not only its prime offices in Rome and Milan, but also 12 other smaller branches.

In the reorganization, the Rome and Milan offices were kept, but the 12 smaller branches were transformed into "commissioned Newcomers Aim Their First Film For European Debut Prior to U.S.

A new indie production company has been formed in New York which is planning its operation to cater to the burgeoning foreign film market. Called the Block Island Film Co., its first project will be an original script called "The Weekenders" and the outfit is considering a plan whereby it would release the U.S.-made film in Europe first, then bringing it to the States almost as an import.

Project is being prepared by Harris Huey and Don Nestingen as producers, in association with Paul Avila Mayer and Edmund Levy. Maude Franchot is associate producer of the film which was written by Mayer and will be directed by Levy. It will begin lensing on location at Block Island, R. I., in mid-July, with production due to be completed by Sept. 8th.

Impetus for the production of the film, as has been the case with many others, has been provided in part by the success of "David & Lisa," the indie, low-budget production that has been such a solid grosser and caused something of a stir inn film circles. Robert Montgomery, attorney for "Lisa," has drawn up the financing plans for "Weekenders," which will be financed on a limited partnership basis as is the case with legit shows.

Associate producer Maude Franchot is working on her first film with this project but has been an active figure in Broadway and off-Broadway presentation. It is her feeling that Broadway is "overweighted" against its participants today and that the real entertainment future lies in films. With the vistas opened by "Lisa" and the often-lamented "product shortage," she feels that low-budget pix like this project have a good chance because a market has opened up for them.

Scripter Mayer will be having his first actual production with the project also, although he has written several others before. He and Wallstreeter Huey are particularly interested in the foreign angles of film production, both feeling that specially-treated, low-budget pix can achieve hefty playoff overseas as well as in the States. In the case of "Weekenders," the debuting overseas first and starting playdates there before U. S. exposure is figured by them as having the dual advantage of potentially securing its recoupment while playing abroad and also building a reputation that will give it easier access to domestic distribution when it is brought to the States. "It's a form of insurance," they claim.

Eyes Earlier Cannes

The possibility exists that the Cannes Film Festival will be moved up next year from its present May berth (it opens tomorrow, Thurs.) to January or February. It is their intention to introduce the property at the fest, as was the case with "Lisa" last year. No distributor has yet been set nor will one be sought until after the film is completed, the feeling being that, for this type of "small" picture, complications arising out of "interference" by outsiders to the company would hurt the project.

Casting will begin this week and run for the next six semesters. Although no major star will be involved, the plan is to use only actors with screen experience. Technical crew has, likewise, not been set as yet but the production will use all union help, the feeling being that it really isn't much cheaper to work non-union and that the quality of the product suffers from non-pro staffers.

Projects like "Weekenders" have been increasing in number considerably in recent months, due in no small measure to "Lisa" and proving again the old saw that "nothing succeeds like success." How much of this new breed Yank product will make it is still something to be seen but one thing is sure.

Broumas Building 2 Youngstown Theatres

Youngstown, O., May 7.

Construction of a theatre in the Boardman Plaza Shopping Centre and another in the Liberty Plaza Shopping Centre in Greater Youngstown, will be operated by John G. Broumas, who has a chain of 24 theatres in the Washington, D.C., area.

Both houses will have between 800 and 900 seats, and have latest projection and sound equipment, designed to offer standard 35m Cinemascope, and 70m films with sterophonic sound.

Burton Robbins Reports NSS Hike Mostly Accepted

Theatremen around the country, "in the vast majority of cases" are complying with the National Screen Service request for a 10% increase in service charges, states Burton E. Robbins, president of NSS. Exhibs have been "fair and understanding," he adds.

NSS hasn't had an upward adjustment in three years, it's stated, and meanwhile its own costs go up via union scales every two years plus upped costs for trailers and accessories. So states Robbins, who also would like to get across the point that leaders of such exhib organizations as the Independent Theatre Owners Assn. of New York "supported our action in increasing our prices to those exhibitors who have not provided us with an upward adjustment for a period of three years or more."

Robbins footnotes: "We have been fortunate in the favorable reaction to our policy, far outweighing the small minority that have failed to recognize the urgency of our problem which has necessitated the upward adjustment of rates in effect three years or longer."

Robert Goulet makes his film bow in Metro's "His and His," comedy to be produced by Pandro S. Berman in October.

Biz Hit by Mild Weather; 'West' Still Champ, 'Arabia' 2d, 'Ugly' 3d, 'Birds' 4th, 'Mockingbird' 5th

With many potential patrons heading for the outdoors over the past weekend, firstrun film biz in current stanza is down sharply in many key cities covered by Variety. Absence of enough strong, new product to go around also is a downbeat factor. Some theatres have been forced to use oldies but results have been rather discouraging.

"How West Was Won" (MGM) (11th wk) again is finishing on top, just as it has been for the last few weeks. "Lawrence of Arabia" (Col) (17th wk) is taking second place, the position it held last stanza.

"Ugly American" (U) (4th wk) is moving up from fourth to third place. "The Birds" (Uth wk), also from Universal, is copping fourth money.

"To Kill a Mockingbird" (U) (10th wk) is winding up fifth, same as a week ago. "Mutiny on Bounty" (MGM) will be sixth, the spot it held last round.

"Longest Day" (20th) (25th wk) is finishing seventh, just as it has for the previous two weeks. "Come Fly With Me" (MGM) (2d wk), which was 10th last stanza, is copping eighth place.

"David and Lisa" (Cont) (18th wk) is taking ninth position while "Could Go On Singing" (UA) (3d wk) rounds out the Top 10 pictures.

"Baloney" (Cont), a newcomer; "Diners' Club" (Col), "Sundays and Cybele" (Davis) and "Long Day's Journey Into Night" (Embassy) are the runnerup films.

Not many of the new entries show much promise currently, however. "Four Days of Naples" (MGM) is rated wow in L.A., big in Boston, tall in Chi but slow in Phili. "Paranoiac" (U), also new, is potent in Denver but mild in Toronto. "Critic's Choice" (WB) continues very spotty.

"Wrong Arm of Law" (Cont), another newie, shapes sock in Toronto, big in N.Y. and good in L.A. Another fresh entrant, "Madame" (Embassy) is not showing much promise this session.

"Operation Bikini" (AI), fairly new, looks lofty in K.C. and sturdy in Denver. "Nine Hours To Rama" (20th), okay in Cincy, is rated mild in both Portland and Buffalo.

"White Slaughter" (BV) continues to get okay to lofty biz in several scattered keys. "Free, White and 21" (AI) still is great in second round in Detroit.

Note: The number of weeks out in release for bigger and longrun pix are designated in each case.

Chi Uneven; 'Hercules' Hefty $18,000, 'Exit' Boff 15G, 'Fly' Fairish $14,000, 'Balcony' Socko 13G, 2d; 'Ugly' 15G

Chicago, May 7.

Chi downer biz is spotty this session as some newcomers make only a minor impact and holdovers are starting to show signs of tiring in a few instances. Words proves of "Hercules and the Captive Women" shapes hefty $18,000. "Four Days of Naples" is rated socko $7,500 at Carnegie. "No Exit," making daydate run at World and Town, shapes smash $13,000 on first. "Lovers of Teruel" looks solid in first Esquire outing.

"Critic's Choice" is rated nice in second at the Chicago. "Come Fly With Me" looms fair in Oriental second. "The Balcony" is notching a terrific second Loop session. Reserve duo of "It's Not In Paradise" and "Tempest In Flesh" continues hotsy in second lap.

"Ugly American" is copping a nifty third Roosevelt stanza. "The Birds" is still lively in fifth State-Lake frame. Longrunning "To Kill A Mockingbird" is solid in its 10th United Artists round.

Hardticket "How West Was Won" remains torrid in 16th McVickers canto while "Lawrence of Arabia" is sock in 16th Cinestage stanza.

Estimates for This Week

Carnegie (Brotman) (456; $1.25-$1.50) — "Four Days of Naples" (MGM). Stout $7,000. Last week, "Long Day's Journey Into Night" (Lorber) (6th wk), $3,000.

Chicago (B&K) (3,900; $0-$1.50) —"Critic's Choice" (WB) (2d wk). Nice $17,500. Last week, $22,000.

Estimates Are Not

Film gross estimates as reported herewith from the various key cities, are net; i.e., without usual tax. Distributors share on net take, when playing percentage, hence the estimated figures are not income.

The parenthetic admission prices, however, as indicated, include U. S. amusement tax.

'Bikini' Lush 17G, Denver; 'Fly' 5G

Denver, May 7.

Firstrun trade looms big in the Mile-High City this stanza, with four new films helping. A list of top holdover also is proving an aid. "Operation Bikini" looks tall on opener at the Denver while "Paranoiac" is rated potent in first at Paramount. "Come Fly With Me" is fine at Denham. Fourth newie, "Sundays and Cybele," shapes big at Vogue.

"How West Was Won" is pacing the upped-scale pic, with capacity biz in ninth session at the Cooper. "To Kill a Mockingbird" still is fancy in fifth stanza at Centre.

Estimates for This Week

Aladdin (Fox) (900; $1.25-$2.75) —"Lawrence of Arabia" (Col) (5th wk). Big 16,000. Last week, $11,000.

Centre (Fox) (1,270; $1.25-$1.45) —"To Kill Mockingbird" (U) (5th wk). Fast $9,000 or over. Last week, $11,000.

Cooper (Cooper) (814; $1.65-$2.50)—"How West Was Won" (MGM) (9th wk). Capacity $10,000 or near. Last week, same.

Denham (Indie) (900; $1.25-$1.45) —"Come Fly With Me" (MGM). Nice $8,000. Last week, "Robe" (20th) (reissue), $3,500.

Denver (Fox) (2,422; $1.25)— "Operation Bikini" (AI). Tall $17,000. Last week, "Diners' Club" (Col) and "Fury of Pagans" (Col), $6,000.

Esquire (Fox) (600; $1.25)— "Monkey in Winter" (MGM). Neat $3,000. Last week, "Longest Day" (20th) (m.o.) (3d wk), $3,500.

'Ball' Passible $6,500, Seattle; 'West' 11G, 4th

Seattle, May 7.

Deferred strike at Boeing plant here, with a settlement expected, is helping first-run biz currently. New screen fare, however, is proving small help. Top newcomer looks to be "Love Is a Ball," good at Coliseum. Neither "I Could Go On Singing" nor "40 Pounds of Trouble" are doing much. "How West Was Won" looks smash at Martin Cinerama in fourth session. "To Kill a Mockingbird" still is good in seventh round at Music Box.

L'ville Biz Not Helped By Derby; 'Diners' Fine 11G, 'Arabia' $6,500, 3d

Louisville, May 7.

The 89th running of the Kentucky Derby had Churchill Downs racing plant loaded with an estimated 125,000 racing fans. Lots of spenders in town, but it was all going out to the track, and at night at the bars and nightclubs. Result was that first-runs received secondary attention.

"Man From Diners Club" looks big at the United Artists on opener. The Mary Anderson with return of "Music Man" and "Baby Jane" looks nice. "Lawrence of Arabia" at the Penthouse is doing neat biz in third.

Estimates for This Week

Kentucky (Switow) (75-$1.25)—"To Kill Mockingbird" (U) (7th wk). Ohs $4,500 in final stanza after sixth week's $5,000.

Washington, May 7.

Trade is generally soft this session. However, "Lawrence of Arabia" is rousing at Ontario and "Birds" shapes big in fourth at Trans-Lux.

"Man From Diners' Club" looms big at the Ambassador and Metropolitan. "Come Fly With Me" looks good in first frame at Palace. "Ugly American" is okay in second round at Warner. "How West Was Won" shapes sock in eighth at Uptown.

Estimates for This Week

Ambassador-Metropolitan (SW) (1,600; 1,000; $1-$1.50) — "Man From Diners' Club" (Col). Big $12,000. Last week, "Giant" (WB) (reissue), $8,700.

Minneapolis, May 7.

Newcomers again are somewhat in evidence, currently however they are not making much of a box-office imprint. Among the fresh entries, the best bet looks like "Madame," but it's only modest at the Gopher.

It's the 11th big session at the World for "To Kill a Mockingbird," "Days of Wine and Roses," at Century also in 11th week, shapes great. The hardticketers "How West Was Won," at Cooper in 8th, and "Lawrence of Arabia" at Academy in third, continue to prosper. That goes for non-hardticket "Birds," too, at the Mann in fourth.

Estimates for This Week

Academy (Mann) (1,000; $1.55-$2.65)—"Lawrence of Arabia" (Col) (3d wk). Mighty $10,000. Last week, $12,000.

Avalon (Frank) (800; $1)—"Babes in Wood" (Aurora) and "Carry On, Nurse" (Gov) (2d run) (3d wk). Okay $1,200. Last week, $1,400.

Armstrong Circuit Reshuffles Key Posts

Toledo, May 7

Several changes in key posts by Armstrong Circuit, with headquarters in Bowling Green, O., have been announced by Jack Armstrong, president. Named to the newly-created post of Toledo city manager is Thor Hauschild, for the last 16 years manager of firm's Jesse James Drive-In.

James Ochs was named to manage the Jesse James, Marvin Harris continues as manager of the Paramount, downtown Cinerama house. Operating from the Bowling Green home office of Armstrong will be George Sawyer as general manager of all the theatres in the circuit. William Herring has been transferred from Fremont, O., to the Bowling Green office to be in charge of concession operations. E. A. Setting, formerly with the Daybrook Hydraulic Co. Bowling Green, has been named comptroller of the chain.

Rare San Antonio House

San Antonio, May 7

The State Theatre, the first known theatre in Texas to be completely and centrally air-conditioned, is being torn down to make way for a parking lot. It was first known as the Majestic. In the late 1920s a new Majestic was built which is the flagship of the Interstate Theatres in downtown San Antonio and the old Majestic was renamed the State. In its grander days, the State had seen the nation's top vaude stars.

Prior to its closing several years ago, the theatre was showing Spanish-language films.

Rien à déclarer?

Seven Arts wishes to declare its pride in being represented at the 1963 International Film Festival at Cannes with "What Ever Happened To Baby Jane?", produced by the Associates and Aldrich Company for Warner Bros. release.

Seven Arts is being represented at Cannes in all areas of motion pictures and television by vice presidents Kenneth Hyman and Norman Katz at the Carlton Hotel.

SEVEN ARTS PRODUCTIONS INTERNATIONAL

Inside Stuff—Pictures

Believing that "horror pictures are part of American folklore, like reading Western stories," and that a market exists for the production of "modest-budgeted scarers," which "probably exploited" will "bring a profit to exhibitors, at an admission price within range of the average audience's pocketbook," Alan V. Ioelin, Albany multiple drive-in owner, has formed a partnership with Del Tenney, stage and television veteran, to produce a series. "The Curse of the Living Corpse" has been completed, at Tenney's studios in Connecticut; "Invasion of the Zombies," other half of a package, is in the cutting stage. They will be ready for release about June 15. This will be on a "territory by territory" basis, with special exploitation campaigns planned by Ioelin and Tenney.

Tenney, who recently finished "Violent Midnight"—to be distributed by Times Films—and Ioelin have originated "new twists" to standard fright-film campaigns.

Writers Francis Swan, formerly with Warner Bros., and Dick Hilliard turned out the stories for Ioelin-Tenney's first pair. Ted Spiegel, with 14 years' experience in promotion, is publicity director. Bill Gold Agency is under contract to prepare the art and the advertising campaign for the initial combination.

Ioelin's seven ozoners in Eastern New York and in Florida are among the theatres which will play the "Curse of the Living Corpse" and "Invasion of the Zombies."

N.Y. Supreme Court Justice Arthur G. Klein last week approved and confirmed a court referee's report which had approved settlement of a stockholder's suit brought by Bertha T. Aine against Universal and Decca officers. Suit had charged that U prexy Milton R. Rackmil had been given "excessive" expenses and that soundtrack deals between Universal and Decca were a waste of corporate assets.

The stipulation for settlement of the action had been filed earlier this year and a hearing was held April 4. The court had appointed Harry Gottlieb as referee to hear the case and determine whether settlement was fair and reasonable. The ref has reported the suit without merit and that settlement was fair and reasonable. Judge Klein has now approved and confirmed this report.

In an interview with the Dublin Sunday Independent on the "Of Human Bondage" set at Ardmore Studios, in Ireland, Maurice "Red" Silverstein, Metro's international prez, admitted: "I cannot lie to you—I was really worried. When you are as far away as Hollywood, and you hear and read about delays and rows and problems you don't know what to believe. I expected the worst, but after what I have seen I cannot tell you how relieved I am." Though admitting that the production was going to cost more than planned, Silverstein said they estimated to finish shooting only two days behind schedule. When asked whether he had experienced such delays and "near disasters" on a previous picture the Metro international exec answered: "Didn't you ever hear of 'Mutiny on the Bounty'?"

Hedda Hopper, in a return gaggster on the CBS radio network last week, reported that her book, "The Truth and Nothing But" (about Hollywood), had "become a bestseller; 50,000 copies were sold in six weeks, and a second printing of 25,000 copies is under way." The columnist added, "I have been sued for $3,000,000 since I was last here—by Michael Wilding." Commented Miss Hopper, "I didn't think anyone's reputation was worth that. I know mine isn't worth it."

Marlon Brando Sr., father of the actor, has tied in with leaders of the Apache Indian Reservation of San Carlos and the Apache Corp. of San Carlos (Arizona) to develop Indian acreage for filmmaking and resort activities. Several Arizona businessmen also are associated in deal. Site, near Globe, will be developed by the Indians with sound stages and facilities for both indoor and outdoor shooting. Apaches also will make themselves available for films and provide horses and other Indian accessories.

commitments. Who decides which pix go to which distribs? Says Hyman: 7A, in addition to casting writers, directors and actors, also is in the unique position of "casting distribs." The idea being that as some stars are right for certain roles, so are some distribs right for certain pix. Exec declined to give a rundown on the individual majors and the types of pix at which they are best at handling—even off-the-record.

In this respect, Hyman stressed 7A's "flexibility" in all production areas, meaning that company develops properties, in so far as possible, without any single star or director in mind, so as to let the writer work with as much leeway as possible "with the exception of those scripts which, for one reason or another, must be developed with the collaboration of the eventual director."

"Flexibility" is also the reason 7A has no desire to saddle itself with operation of a British studio, a possibility that was rumored last year. However, Hyman said, the company has been considering the formation of a permanent crew of key technical people, a crew which would work together on one 7A production after another and whose members would have free rein to exercise their own creativity. Such a permanent crew would consist of a chief cameraman, art director, production manager and cutter.

Lardner Draft

Mayes is presently working on the screenplay for this project which will be filmed in Hawaii. Columbia will release this one. Yet another film, this one figured for 1965 production, is the screen treatment of "The Other Side of the Coin."

"Cardinal" will have its world preem Dec. 11 at the Saxon Theatre; Boston, and opens the following day in New York at the DeMille Theatre. Tickets have been on sale in both houses since shooting began and the ad campaign for the filmization of Henry Morton Thompson's novel was underway almost before the cameras even rolled.

Preminger will go from the Coast to London May 14 to supervise editing of the film which is being printed by Technicolor there. Jerome Moross has written the musical score for the pic and RCA Victor Records will be issuing the soundtrack LP, as it has done with several past Preminger pix.

tainment Corp. of America. His plans as of now are unresolved.

Jonas Rosenfield had been a Col v.p. in ad-pub and then in general management affairs, as was Paul N. Lazarus Jr. before him. Rosenfield is between jobs and Lazarus is exec v.p. of Samuel Bronston Productions.

Fred Goldberg runs the show at UA as followup to Roger Lewis who's now in indie production. Former co-owner-v.p. Youngstein, now also in indie production, also had held the ad-pub reins at UA.

Charles Simonelli quit Universal to become another ECA casualty and is now with Technicolor. Relative newcomer Richard Lederer is in command at WB. Metro is now going with Dan Terrell and Clark Ramsay running the ad-pub and marketing activities in the east, with v.p. Howard Strickling continuing as v.p. in Culver City. Vet ad exec Si Seadler is handling special assignments at MGM. Harold Rand, ex-Paramount, Disney, etc., holds pub spotlight at 20th.

Strickling and U's Dave Lipton are the only two oldtimers who have remained at the very top. Other than these two execs, it's hard to tell the players without a program.

Ioelin-Tenney Finish Two In Zombie Boom

Ioelin-Tenney Productions, new east coast production company, reports the completion of their first two pix, "Curse of The Living Corpse" and "Invasion of The Zombies." Pix are the first in a continuing program of exploitation features mapped by the company heads, exhib Alan V. Ioelin and producer-director Del Tenney.

Ted Spiegel, formerly ad-pub director for Kingsley International, is veep in charge of ad-pub for the firm. Currently in preparation for shooting in the future are two properties, "Airline Stewardesses" and "Ski Weekend."

Sez Roadshows Unfailingly Take Dive in Hickville

Minneapolis, May 7.

In the town of Williston, N. D., population 12,000, roadshow pictures costing up to 70%, consistently have been boxoffice busts. That's what the North Central Allied convention here last week was told from the podium by John Snyder, Williston exhibitor.

"Every one of them flopped at the boxoffice and I'll wager the same is true in other small towns," said Snyder. "I mean, of course, as far as enabling me to come out even on the terms exacted for them.

"What we're living on now are adjustments and our concessions. Except for them we'd be dead."

Milton London, Allied States' executive director, a convention speaker, assured Snyder and others present at the meeting that "the day of the roadshow pictures is about over—at the most there'll only be two more of them because they are not paying off well enough for the film companies."

Art Films of Rio And International of Canada Acquire Embassy Product

Embassy Pictures has set further foreign distribution deals and is working on still others in a continued drive to build a strong international web. Latest deals involve South America and Canada with others still pending in Germany and France.

Embassy has concluded an agreement for the distribution of six features in Brazil with the Rio firm of Art Films S.A. Arrangements were made by Joseph C. Goltz, the distrib's Latino supervisor, and are part of a broader plan to increase distribution of its product in that area. Set for Brazilian distribution are "Boccaccio '70," "Landru," "Long Day's Journey Into Night," "Bimbo," "Constantine and the Cross" and "Sky Above — Mud Below."

In Canada, the company has arranged with International Film Distributors Ltd. to market 10 of its current pix. These include "8½," "Landru," "The Light Fantastic," "Young Girls of Good Families," "Threepenny Opera," "Women of the World," "Queen Bee," "Only One New York," "Hellfire Club" and "Fury at Smugglers Bay." Latter two are recent exploitation acquisitions.

Leonard Lightstone, Embassy exec v.p., left yesterday for Paris en his way to the Cannes Film Festival. His stop in that city is for the purpose of continuing negotiations for a man to oversee distribution of the company's product in Europe and to open an office there. There is also a deal pending for the distribution of Embassy product in Germany but Lightstone hasn't had a chance to get to that country recently and no arrangements won't be completed there until he finds time to spend some time completing talks with an outfit with whom negotiations have previously begun.

20th-Fox closing production deal with Fred Kohlmar to join company with his indie.

Executive Compensation Limitation Due for Vote at AB-PT Meeting

American Broadcasting - Paramount Theatres will hold its annual stockholders meeting May 21 at its New York homeoffice. Up for consideration will be the election of a board of directors, all the nominees for which are incumbents, a stockholder proposal regarding limitation of exec compensation and other business.

Up for re-election are Leonard H. Goldenson, AB-PT prez; Everett H. Erlick, v.p.-general counsel of the corp.; James G. Riddell, ABC veep; Simon B. Siegel, exec v.p. of the corp.; David B. Wallerstein, prez of AB-PT theatre operating subsid Balaban & Katz; A. H. Blank, Alger B. Chapman, John A. Coleman, E. Chester Gersten, Jack Hausman, Robert H. Hinckley, Robert L. Huffines Jr., Walter P. Marshall and Joseph A. Martino.

The aggregate remuneration for this group in 1962 was $666,267, with Goldenson getting $125,000, Siegel $75,000, Erlick $50,000, Riddell $60,000, Wallerstein $37,000, Hinckley $31,000 and v.p. Edward L. Hyman $82,000. These figures do not include awards for fiscal '62 involving the AB-PT Key Employees Incentive Compensation Plan, being challenged at the meeting as, indeed, it was last year.

Such awards came to $56,000 for Goldenson, $42,000 for Siegel and $15,000 for Hyman and for directors and officers as a group, $107,000—all paid in 1962. Paid in January, 1963, was $12,500 to Erlick and $30,000 to the officers and directors as a group. Plan also provides for payment as of termination of their employment of $100,000 to Goldenson, $77,000 to Siegel, $30,000 to Hyman and $212,500 to directors and officers as a group.

Limits

Gotham stockholder John Henry Campbell has declared his intention of bringing a motion to the floor of the meeting asking holders to amend the Compensation Plan, which was adopted in 1961, to provide that no exec get compensation payment in any one year in excess of 100% of his salary and that in no event shall his aggregate compensation, including bonus payments, exceed $300,000 per annum. Management opposes this resolution.

Since the beginning of fiscal 1962, options have been granted under the corp's Restricted Stock Option Plan to directors and officers, except for the above salaried officers. Options relating to 2,000 shares of common stock at $33.250 per share were granted to officers on Feb. 11, 1963, being the total granted to all directors and officers of the corp as a group. The closing price on the N. Y. Stock Exchange on the date of the grant was $35.125. No cash was received upon granting of the options.

Options to buy common stock under the corp's 1956 Common Stock Option Plan were exercised between Dec. 31, 1961 and March 21, 1963 as follows: Hinckley, 1,500 shares, option amount $37,735.12, market value, $50,475; Wallerstein, 2,143 shares, option amount $50,046.96, market value, $69,647.50; and all directors and officers as a group, 6,304 shares, option amount $151,551.48, market value $221,783.13.

Options to buy common stock under the 1956 restricted Stock Option Plan were exercised between Dec. 31, 1961 and March 21, 1963 by none of the salaried execs above and by all directors and officers as a group, 650 shares, option amount $15,581.80, market value $29,900.

SAG, AMPP Agree On One Point; No Bias

Hollywood, May 7.

Screen Actors Guild and the Assn. of Motion Picture Producers, currently in negotiations on a new theatrical film pact, have reached agreement in principle on SAG's demand for a non-discrimination policy to be written into the new pact. However, it was emphasized that no agreement made thus far is binding until agreement is reached on all the points being considered.

Key demand of SAG, for adoption of a formula of payment for actors of post-January, 1960 pix shown on pay tv, is still in negotiation. SAG also wants identification of the actor with the character he plays when cast credit is given on the film.

Meetings continue on these two points. Board plans to call a special membership meeting to report on negotiations and for a discussion on them by members. Date of such a meeting depends on progress made in the negotiations.

SEG Yells 'Help' In Scramble Of Election Count

Hollywood, May 7.

Screen Extras Guild's exec committee has called a meeting of its full board of directors today (Tues.) to urge the body to ask U. S. Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz to name an impartial referee to solve new complications in the union's election.

Last week, four challenges were filed—two by members of an indie slate headed by Tony Regan and two by proxy Jeffrey Sayre of the Administrations ticket. The Regan slate, in unofficial tabulations, leads in five of the six races for offices and in five of the 11 for the board.

Newest mixup came when Cohn, Baldwin & Villmure, CPA firm, notified M. O'Neil Shanks, union secretary, that 80 ballots not included in the vote tabulation last Wednesday (1) had been discovered in the accountants' office. These ballots in envelopes had been sliced open by an employee of the firm. The 80 votes could effect the outcome of the election of three officers and three board members but not Regan's defeat of Sayre for presidency.

SEG exec committee met last Saturday (4) and voted unanimously that neither it nor the board should decide whether the ballots should be counted or ignored. On Thursday, the union asked Thomas Pitts, secretary of the California Labor Federations, to referee the four challenges. Pitts is unavailable, so the exec committee decided to ask Wirtz to aid in the Guild's selection of an impartial ref to determine the status of the 80 ballots as well as the challenges. The exec committee will also recommend to board today that SEG select a different CPA firm.

Lots of Professionals Attend Non-Theatrical Exhibit at Biltmore, N.Y.

Close to 1,000 persons were in attendance in New York last week for the fifth annual American Film Festival of non-theatrical pix at the Biltmore Hotel. Four-day affair spotlights achievements in 16m filmmaking, from industrial films and shorts to audio-visual aids.

More than 300 films were screened, including Alain Resnais' already acclaimed concentration camp documentary, "Night and the Fog." Affair, which was open to the public, drew a heavy attendance of professional filmmakers, film librarians and audio-visual directors.

Hift's London Helpers

London, May 7.

Rowland Hill ad-pub director for a magazine here and earlier with the Rank Organization, has been named publicity director of 20th-Fox in Great Britain. Ronald Shinn, Anglo-Amalgamated's ad-pub director for last 10 years, joins as assistant publicity manager. Hill succeeds John Ware, who exited recently.

Both posts are under the supervision of Fred Hift, 20th pub director for Britain, Europe and Middle East.

RCA's $2-Billions

1963 first quarter that beat last year's record quarter.

RCA prexy Dr. Elmer W. Engstrom predicted that the company, now over the billion and a half mark in billings, will hit two billion by '65. He said the company is "energetically developing new potential in functions and technologies that do not now exist in practical form, but which we believe will provide the basis for continuing expansion."

A former trouble area—data processing—has been picking up sales steam, the company said. And color tv is running 40% ahead of last year, stockholders were informed. (Company said total color set sales will reach between 750,000 and 1,000,000 units "if tubes are available" this year.)

Robert Sarnoff, chairman of subsidiary NBC, declared that 1962 network sales were 12% ahead of 1961 and, better, earnings 35% higher. He said that first quarter profits for '63 were "well above" the same time in '62 and that the upward trend is continuing in this year's second quarter, particularly in the tv network end.

"There is every reason to believe that as overall advertising expenditures continue to rise," Sarnoff, the younger, said, "broadcasting, particularly tv, will increasingly enlarge its share of the total."

A Bowl of Ustinov

Boston, May 7.

Peter Ustinov will be honored at the third Boston International Film Festival, June 12-22, per George Papadopulo, the fest's director.

Ustinov gets Paul Revere Silver Bowl award for his work in "Billy Budd." Presentation will be made by Mrs. Toni Peabody, wife of the governor of state.

City Review Chairman, Columbus Editorialist Trade Belittlements

Columbus, O., May 7.

Victor Goodman, chairman of the city film review board, took exception to an editorial in the Columbus Citizen-Journal which stated that an ordinance being pushed by Goodman to strengthen the law under which the board operates "would do little good."

The ordinance, to be considered by the city council, requires exhibitors to file, three days ahead of opening, the name and description of films. "The proposed ordinance would do little good," said the editorial. "The name of a movie often tells little about it. A description would depend on who writes it. A synopsis of 'Hamlet' might cause a review board to bar it. 'West Side Story' might be barred on a bare description of its plot. We oppose pre-censorship of movies — or of books and newspapers—in principle. Our courts have pretty well knocked out censorship. There are tough statutes on filth that can be enforced. If [illegible] clean and entertaining often fail because the people who clamor for better movies don't go to see them."

Goodman said the editorial sacrificed "accuracy for brevity." He said the proposed ordinance would not give the board authority to bar exhibition of a film on the basis of a description. He said the description would be correlated with ratings put out by the Legion of Decency, Film Estimate Board and similar groups.

Goodman said that if the Ohio Legislature adopts an amendment extending injunctive powers of the obscene literature law to include films, then the local board could file injunctions against films believed to be obscene, based on the furnished descriptions and the ratings of the national groups.

MCA Fellowships

Universal also recently started a plan to develop already-established performers into boxoffice attractions of a more stable and potent nature via all-out programs. First target of this plan was the signing of Angie Dickinson to a term agreement and the plotting of a comprehensive promotion and picture campaign for her. Others are expected to follow her in this plan.

U execs have long been commenting on their feeling of optimism for the film biz here and they have been in a good position to do so, since the company is currently moving through one of its biggest years. These talent development moves and now MCA's interest would seem to indicate an interest not only in the present but the future of the biz as well.

Howard Apfel, a member at large of Local 776 and a signer of the document, said that one of the reasons was because of alleged violation of the union's bylaws by 776 prez Warren Low. Low, when contacted, said "I don't care to comment on it. There is a letter which I had our office make up to send to the members."

Repeal of That Crazy California March Tax on Negative Closer

Sacramento, May 7.

Legislation to sharply curb property taxation slapped on all film negatives in Los Angeles County (Hollywood) on first Monday of March of each year moved a step nearer last week (30) when the California Senate Committee on Revenue and Taxation gave a do-pass recommendation to a bill introduced by State Senator Thomas Rees (D-Los Angeles).

Under provisions of bill the present practice of assessing such negatives would come in for a reform and taxes would be levied only on the actual cash value of the footage itself.

This would eliminate the present yardstick which, for tax purposes, estimates eventual distribution value, etc., which in the past has ranged upwards of $50,000,000, as amount to be taxed.

Also pending is a similar bill which was introduced in California Legislature by Assembly GOP floorleader Charles J. Conrad, also a film actor between legislative sessions for past 17 years. Conrad's bill is backed by 20 other Assemblymen and both his and Rees' are supported by almost all Hollywood unions, plus combined MPAA-AFL Film Council committee fighting "runaway" production.

[illegible] bill reported that a Supreme Court decision in the Michael Todd Co. case over "Around the World in 80 Days" resulted in tax being levied on the intangible as well as tangible value of a picture.

Conrad, in pointing to effects of the same case on March taxation, said such a tax is not assessed in New York State or in foreign countries, and this has led to closing down production in Hollywood as the March assessment day approaches, causing additional hardship to studio personnel already handicapped by cutback in domestic production.

Will Assembly Say 'Amen'?

Hollywood, May 7.

Film producers and studios are eagerly awaiting passage of the California State Assembly of the State Senate's approval May 1 by a vote of 25-0 of a bill which would exempt the film industry from paying property taxes on intangible assets of a motion picture.

Senate action was taken after the California Senate Committee on Revenue and Taxation April 30 gave a do-pass recommendation to a bill introduced by State Senator Thomas Rees (D-L.A.) which would sharply curb property taxation on all film negatives in L.A. County on first Monday of March each year.

The measure now goes to the Assembly.

Motion picture and television industry would be benefitted immeasurably by final passage of bill, because then pix and tv subjects could be shedded without fear of the early March assessment date. This in turn would lead to orderly scheduling of pix, and subsequent aid in employment.

No. Carolina Preserves Its Traits on Celluloid

Raleigh, N.C., May 7.

Cameras are grinding out the story of North Carolina's past, present and some of her hopes for the future.

"In three years we should have the nucleus of a first class film library of North Carolina life," said James Beveridge, director of the North Carolina Film Board.

The board was established in October 1962 under a three-year grant from the Richardson Foundation in New York City. It is in the process of producing 11 films on as many different Tar Heel subjects. The state subsidizes its operation.

A film on the General Assembly will be the first ready for showing. It should be finished by June 1.

Theatre Costs May Be Upped By New Ohio Laws

Columbus, O., May 7.

Exemption of theatre employees from provisions of a $1.25 per hour state minimum wage bill in the Ohio Senate is being sought, per Ken Prichett, executive secretary of the Independent Theatre Owners of Ohio.

Prichett also is fighting for exclusion of motion pictures from a Senate bill to expand the law which prohibits dissemination of "obscene" matter to minors. He said a House bill to permit county-exempted village and city school districts to tax income if approved by voters is not to the advantage of theatremen. He said a House bill to reduce personal property tax assessments to 50% deserves support.

Prichett also is supporting a House bill to permit boys over 16 to work as theatre ushers until 11 p.m. He said he is watching closely a House bill relating to dissemination of obscene material to minors. He said this bill "may be another back door to censorship." Bill to amend the state constitution to establish Daylight Savings time, introduced in the Senate, is being fought by Prichett. He also said he is opposing a House bill which would include motion pictures in the injunction provisions of the present state law governing obscene literature.

Calls It 'Sham Issue'

Columbus, O., May 7.

Obscenity is a "sham issue" raised to "justify improper infringement on freedom of speech and as a smoke screen to hide the inefficient operation of the Columbus film review board," said Robert N. Shamansky, attorney for the Independent Theatre Owners of Ohio, in a letter to the editor of the Columbus Citizen-Journal.

Shamansky's letter was in reply to one published in the newspaper earlier from Victor Goodman, chairman of the film review board. Goodman said that "just one clear-cut court recognition of obscenity as obscenity would go a long way toward discouraging the making of obscene films."

Shamansky said the board "has more than ample powers to utilize ratings of various national agencies. Why aren't they being used now? If a movie is shown just once, no one can object if it is declared obscene. The pernicious and unconstitutional doctrine of bureaucratic censorship prior to at least one publication is what runs counter to our American tradition of freedom of speech."

Goodman is urging City Council to approve an ordinance which would require exhibitors to file titles and descriptions of bookings at least three days prior to opening. The ordinance is frankly aimed at nudie-houses which, the board believes, would be unable or unwilling to submit titles and descriptions of their bookings.

Three Pix Planned, One Tele Series, 1 Legiter On Conan Doyle Works

London, May 7.

Blockbusting approach to the works of the late Sir Arthur Conan Doyle is planned by a new company, Sir Nigel Films Ltd., topped by Adrian Conan Doyle, the author's estate trustee, and U.S. film producer Henry Lester. First production will be co-produced with C. C. Films (London) Ltd., and will introduce Sherlock Holmes and Dr. Watson in "The Fog." It's skedded to start June 10 in color, from a Leigh Vance screenplay.

Two other pix are currently in preparation. One is based on "The White Company," and is in the plus-million dollar budget league. The other, based on the "Brigadier Gerard" yarns, will be made in Paris in association with Les Films Raoul Ploquin.

Other show biz plans of the new company include a tele series called "The Sir Arthur Conan Doyle Theatre" and the musical play "Baker Street," scheduled for Broadway in association with Alexander Cohen. Michael Langham will direct and Rex Harrison is dickering with the idea of playing the world's most famous sleuth.

JIM CARRERAS' SAFARI

Intensive U.S. Dates On Sunday Prods., Plus Variety Club

London, May 7.

James Carreras, head of Hammer Films in London, is flying to New York tomorrow (Wed.) for negotiations with Columbia and Universal, as well as with Eliot Hyman, with whom he has been closely associated for many years.

High on the agenda are talks with Milton Rackmil on the upcoming production of "She," which is being filmed by Hammer in CinemaScope and Technicolor. This will be followed by "Devil Ship Pirates" and by a new sci-fi thriller, "Quatermass and the Pit."

After three days in New York, Carreras will leave for Houston, to attend the Variety Club's international convention in his capacity as first assistant chief international barker. He will return to Manhattan on May 18, staying for a week, before planing back to London.

SECOND C'RAMA DOMER SET FOR LOS ANGELES

Los Angeles, May 7.

A second Cinerama dome theatre is skedded for construction by Pacific Drive-In Theatres in the Los Angeles area, following groundbreaking three weeks ago of the first in center of Hollywood.

Newly-planned structure is planned for a shopping center in Lakewood, between L.A. and Long Beach, and will seat 1,000. Building starts in October, following completion of the Hollywood showcase (across the street from DAILY VARIETY office) in October.

Italy Key

agents" for U product. By this change, the company was able to cut down on its overhead and the many headaches always attendant upon doing business in an alien land (labor, tax problems, etc.), without impairing efficiency. In fact, says Aboaf, efficiency was in many ways increased. For the first time, the newly "commissioned agents" had a percentage interest in the product they handled, instead of just working for a regular weekly paycheck which rolled in come-what-may.

No Abdication

The veep is at pains to stress that the company has not, in any of these areas where it has switched the status of its offices, abdicated any of its responsibility to its own indie producers, or delegated any final authority in the selling of its product to the affiliated distribs. As in Italy, U always maintains its own, bonafide U reps who, by contract, have the right to yea or nay any deal.

Emphasized by the veep as the key to the philosophy behind U's overseas reorganization: "We are in business to make the greatest net profit possible for our producers, as well as for ourselves." In other words, Universal, having been able to so drastically slash overseas distrib costs, no longer has to concentrate on racking up gross figures, as opposed to net, simply to cover the cost of a huge distrib organization. That is, there no longer is the necessity of taking on product in quantity to pay for—say—the light bills.

cism conducted by Frank Woods (subsequently a scenarist for D. W. Griffith) under the heading of "The Spectator". This would also antedate the Martin claim of being the "first" film reviewer in the land.

The N. Y. Times review of D. W. Griffith's Biograph Film, "Pippa Passes" (based on Browning's poem), published in its issue for Oct. 10, 1909, also precedes the Martin notice of a seven-year-old film by a year.

The first newspaper film critique in the world may have been the lengthy (c. 1,450 words) review of a Lumiere program of "moving photography" that was shown at the Nizhni Novgorod Fair in the summer of 1896. It was published in the Nizhegorodski Listok for July 4, 1896 and signed by I. M. Pacatus, which was a pen-name of Maxim Gorki, which in turn was a second pseudonym of Alexei Maximovich Pyeshkov (1868-1936).

The town of Nizhni Novgorod, now renamed Gorki, is also the only metropolis of its size (population 942,000) ever named for a film critic anywhere in the world. Even if he was only a one-shot publicist for a tent show full of flickering shadows.

Film savant St. Deptula seemingly has more carefully documented the priorities.—Ed.)

So. Carolina Negroes 'Trespassed' On Theatre, Fined $1, Take Appeal

High Point, N.C., May 7.

Seven Negroes and two white men, charged with "trespassing," when they picketed Paramount Theatre here last week, were ordered to pay $1 fines and court costs after trial in municipal court here.

The defendants gave notice of appeal to superior court and posted $200 bond each. They had remained in jail refusing food, since their arrest Saturday.

During a noon recess of the consolidated trial, Judge Byron Haworth placed the defendants in the custody of their attorney. The defendants are all members of the local chapter of the Congress of Racial Equality. Negroes have been picketing the Paramount Theatre seeking admittance off and on for several months.

The theatre is located in the city hall in quarters leased to Key Theatres Inc. by the city. Mayor Carson Stout directed police to arrest the pickets after he was called to the theatre. He said he found the pickets, with arms locked, barring exits and entrances to the theatre. He testified as to his role in the arrest in the trial.

Pickets testified that they had tried to purchase tickets at the box office, but were refused. R. Hunter Morey, 23, of Evanston, Ill., a white member of CORE, testified: "We came down to the theatre with money to buy tickets. We were refused. When people started hitting us, we just stood there and took it."

During the trial, the defense contended that the city has no right to lease public facilities to a theatre which closes its doors to Negroes.

And In Charlotte—

Charlotte, N.C., May 7.

Leaders of an integration movement here voted to postpone picketing of all the city's hotels, motels, restaurants and theatres until next week when the second North Carolina International Trade Fair opens here.

They restrained about 100 students, mostly Negroes, who opposed the postponement.

Dr. R. A. Hawkins, Negro dentist and head of the Coordinating Committee of the Mecklenburg County Organization on Political Affairs, told the students the postponement was requested by Gov. Terry Sanford.

The governor, Hawkins said, promised to negotiate with business owners here toward breaking segregation barriers if the picketing was postponed two or three days. Hawkins asked that the postponement be granted.

FOREMAN LECTURING AT U. OF TEL AVIV

London, May 7.

Filmmaker Carl Foreman will give a series of lectures on film writing and production at the U. of Tel Aviv as an official guest of the Israeli government either this August or the spring of 1964, depending on completion of editing of his latest "The Victors."

Additionally, he has also agreed to appear at a British-American conference to be held under the Auspices of the Ditchley Foundation at which he'll speak as one of 30 prominent men on the subject of the national images of Britain and the U.S. as projected through the use of tv, radio, films and the press. This session will be held later this year at Enstone, Oxfordshire, England.

These are but two of a batch of requests the director has received asking him to speak before various groups of filmmakers and students in more than 15 countries. When Foreman arrives in the States with the completed "Victors" prior to its December release for Columbia, he plans to fulfill some other speaking engagements on this side of the ocean.

particularly wanted Hayley Mills and, when she's in the States, Disney has her," he commented. He was also particularly high on the casting of Dame Edith Evans, as well as Deborah Kerr and John Mills.

Cost or location had little to do with it, although certain atmospheric conditions have naturally benefited the film, he pointed out. "Backgrounds are only a tapestry," Hunter noted, "the important thing is the story. Besides, you can't do a picture cheaper over there anymore." Despite the fact that he is on the scene, Hunter has had a replica chalk cliff built in the studio because of weather complications for shooting. He's always been a big one for set rebuilding anyway, having rebuilt Grand Street at Universal for "Flower Drum Song" and recreated a section of New York's East River Drive for "Thrill of It All" when the weatherman didn't cooperate with his lensing sked. From the budget standpoint, "Chalk" is skedded at $2,500,000 and is an Eady Plan pic.

Said Hunter of the film biz today, "there is nothing terrible about our industry today. We're trying to survive. We're working on the age-old idea of trying to find out what the public wants. But it is very, very difficult to make a picture today. There are too many strings—too many fringe, fast buck producers and too many bankers. Our job is to get the audience back in the theatre and a picture has to be made to appeal to the widest possible audience."

In this connection he commented on the types of pictures being made today—the Gloss Hunter pic vs. the highly realistic film—saying, "when you go into this industry you have to make up your mind whether you want to be a film producer or be put up on a pedestal by a few intellectuals. When you do a picture you have to ask why and for what audience. I'm not knocking the other (realistic) kind of pictures but, in an industry that turns out as many pictures as ours does, there better be one or two of my kind too." And considering the success of "Pillow Talk," the "Tammy" pix and others of his last 15 U features, he is sure of the slick, romantic approach as a b.o. socker. "Art too can be commercial," he said, noting that he was going to try to prove it with "Chalk."

There are several other Gloss Hunter productions in the works. Soon to be released is "Thrill of It All," penned by Carl Reiner who is currently working on another script for the producer called "The Art of Love." Douglas Heyes, who collaborated with John Michael Hayes on "Chalk," is presently penning "Twelfth of Never." Gene Holloway is writing "Madame X" (again) and John Lee Mahon is scripting "Dark Angel," which may be Hunter's next. And there are others under consideration.

WALTER SHENSON IN FOR UA DISCUSSIONS

London, May 7.

Walter Shenson left London last week for New York for discussions with United Artists executives on the plans for launching his new comedy, "The Mouse on the Moon," in New York next month. The film opened a prerelease engagement at the London Pavilion last Friday (3).

During his visit Shenson will also talk with United Artists on future production plans. He aims to be back in time to attend the Cannes festival.

Prior to the West End opening of "Moon," Shenson organized a private screening for officials of the American and Russian Embassies. The film takes a satirical peek at the space race, describing how both the U.S. and U.S.S.R. are beaten to the moon by a tiny country.

Panken's Feature-Minded

Film Programs Inc., of which Arnold Panken is exec producer, intends to go into feature theatrical production following completion of a 15-minute comedy, "That's Me," starring Walter Stuart. Company has been long active in industrial and television film production, with specifics of features now being plotted.

Alan Arkin, featured in the legiter "Enter Laughing," and Andrew Duncan, regular on the Sid Caesar television series, are starred in "That's Me," which was lensed in Manhattan's Central Park.

Murder at the Gallop

The result is easygoing, undemanding entertainment that could produce healthy boxoffice returns.

Adapted from Miss Christie's "After The Funeral" Dovid Pursall, Jack Seddon and James P. Cavanagh have concocted a yarn with just about the right number of red herrings and a climax which, while fairly predictable, rounds the proceedings off satisfactorily. The crime is set in a homey atmosphere in a small village. An old recluse is discovered by Miss Marple. The police think he's had a heart attack, but Miss Marple doesn't. She suspects all four members of the old man's family, all of whom stand to benefit by his will. So Miss Marple starts to follow up her hunch. She finds that a valuable picture is probably the best clue. Two other murders and by a process of elimination she is beginning to solve the puzzle. But she has to risk being murdered herself to get the proof.

Miss Rutherford, waddling around with sagging jaws, behaving and looking rather like an impatient bloodhound, gives a joyous, energetic performance. Robert Morley performs fittingly as one of the suspects. Charles Tingwell as the patient detective, and Flora Robson, Duncan Lamont, James Villiers, Robert Urquhart and comely Katya Douglas as other suspects fill the bill admirably, and Stringer Davis makes two or three effectively funny appearances with Miss Rutherford, his real-life spouse.

George H. Brown's production and George Pollock's direction is smooth and the film is just about the right length to fit the story. Art and camera work are both satisfactory. Rich.

Als Twee Druppels Water

(The Dark Room Of Damocles)

(DUTCH)

Amsterdam, April 30.

A Hathor (Paul Kijser) release of Cinecentrale production. Stars Lex Schaepel, Nan List. Features Mia Goossen, Guus Verstraete. Directed by Fons Rademakers. Screenplay, Rademakers, J.H. Veerman, from novel by W. F. Hermans; camera (Franscope), Raoul Coutard; music, Jurriaan Andriessen. At Calypso and Circus cinemas, Amsterdam. Running time, 106 mins.

Rucher Durbeck	Lex Schaepel
His big wife	Mia Goossen
Marianne	Nan List
Eberwine	Guus Verstraete

In the field of feature films, Fons Rademakers is one of Holland's foremost and most prolific film director. His first film, "Village On The River," was nominated for the Oscar. Now his fourth, "Dark Room Of Damocles," is officially singled out to represent The Netherlands at the Cannes Film Fest. "Dark Room," based on the novel by W. F. Hermans published in Grove Press in the U.S., Rademakers points up the fact that people under pressure of suddenly altered circumstances, like war, rise above their own trivialities and develop beyond their usual limitations.

Age not the background of the second World War and the German occupation, this shows the character of Ducker, a young man, married to an older woman who cuckolds him with a Quisling. Not able to make contact with other people, Ducker does not care, only loving his insane mother. One night, he sees a parachutist drop in his garden. He is a secret agent by the name of Durbeck, who looks like Ducker except for his black hair and tough character.

Through Mia Ducker becomes active in the underground movement, carrying out Durbeck's orders. He kills provocative agents, becomes a bold Don Juan. When the Germans put out a search warrants for him, a girl friend of his paints his hair black so as to disguise him, but making him look more than ever like Durbeck, his super ego. The way over, Ducker is arrested for collaboration with the Germans. He cannot prove the existence of Durbeck since all evidence of Durbeck is lost. Hence, Ducker must take the responsibility.

Rademakers has made an intelligent film that can be interpreted in two ways. First is that Durbeck really existed, second that he is only a part of Ducker's personality (through circumstances the unimaginative little man becomes a hero, but when the times become normal again, the little man must take responsibility for the actions, good or bad, of the hero).

Like Rademakers' previous pix, "Dark Room" is a cool film, observing characters, changing in acting style from one moment to the other when a scene requires it. The overall effect of this vehicle may seem bewildering. But in retrospect, the viewer is apt to rate the script well written.

Even for Holland, "Dark Room" has no name actors, the director preferring to chose the actors for suitability. Lex Schaepel, as Ducker-Durbeck, and Nan Lee in the role of Marrianne, under Rademakers' direction make the film very real. From these actors as well as the other local talent in cameo parts, the director has extracted good performances. French cameraman Raoul Coutard is responsible for the excellent camera work. This is more a broad drama than a war film, which may help sell it abroad. An English version is being prepared. Saul.

Paris, April 26.

Films Fleuriet release of Pierre Braunberger production. With Nadine Ballot, Jean-Claude Bernal, Madeleine Landry, Jean Claude. Written and directed by Jean Rouch. Camera, Michel Brault, Roger Morillere; editor, Annie Tresgot. Previewed in Paris. Running time, 60 mins.

Nadine	Nadine Ballot
Jean-Claude	Jean-Claude Bernal
Landry	Madeleine Landry
Engineer	Jean Claude

Jean Rouch again experiments with his so-called "Truth Cinema" in this hour-long pic in which a situation is set up and spontaneously played out and improvised by non-actors. Film has flashes of insight and depth but its length, anecdote rather than story aspect, as well as its offbeat qualities make this primarily an arty house supporting film abroad in some few spots.

Pic was first shown on tv here before being released in theatres. A 17-year-old girl is late for class and is banished by an irate teacher. She has a whole day before her and decides to float around Paris in search of adventure. This comes via meetings with three different men who all prove disappointing. She finally wends her way home fending off besieging males.

Rouch has a deft and mobile camera that follows the characters every place, in buses, parks, museums, streets, etc. Format is to give characters an idea of the theme and then let them act it out on their own. If they sometimes identify and allow for revealing, punchy scenes, the fact that they are called on to explain endlessly what they feel gives this a garrulous quality not always put across by the visuals for many listless bits.

But Nadine Ballot has the youthful, naive characteristics as well as a promise of more than her fairly silly quest for adventure indicates. The men in this are mostly on the defensive against this amoral, searching pretty little girl.

Camerawork is good. It shapes an interesting experiment that sometimes begs the question by setting up a theme, exploding it but not always being able to make it truly telling by one controlled point of view.

This shapes as an offtheater with some fresh insights, but looks like only for specialized theatrical use. It is technically good. Mook.

L'Immortelle

Paris, April 26.

Cocinor release of Lama-Tamara Hamile Film production. With Francoise Brion, Jacques Daniel Valerose, Catherine Minet. Written and directed by Alain Robbe-Grillet. Camera, Maurice Barry, editor, Robert Wade. At Lord Byron, Paris. Running time, 100 mins.

Woman	Francoise Brion
Man	Jacques Daniel Valerose

The scriptwriter of that hermetic offbeater "Last Year In Marienbad," Alain Robbe-Grillet, now turns director-writer for this follow-up effort. Again there is a vague triangle, a mixture of past and present plus intimations of the future, with a little more clarity than its predecessor. Its repetitive aspects stamp this primarily for artier abroad, and calling for a hardsell.

A mack-looking French teacher meets a girl in Istanbul who speaks perfect French but says she is not French. She seems to be followed by or is sometimes with a sinister fat man with dark glasses and accompanied by two enormous dogs.

Love and meetings take place between the teacher and the girl but he can never find out much about her. One day one of the dogs appears on the road while they are driving and a crash has her killed. He still can find nothing out about her and ends up also being killed in a similar accident.

Call it obsession, dream, the difficulty of memory, this has a series of repeated scenes and intimations of mystery that are sometimes stultifying.

But here at least it is evident these two people did meet and he is a teacher if her background remains unknown. A belly dance scene in a night club is repeated with the girl doing the same thing when they are alone plus intimated bouts of love on their interminable walks about the city.

Istanbul's colorful streets, buildings and countryside add to the unreality of this arty pic. There can be little acting in a posed pic of this kind. Jacques Daniel-Valcrose has the puzzled, pained—one expression that the adventure seems to call for and Francoise Brion is a well-built young lady with a good boned face but not able to exude the mysterious femme fatale lure it demands.

Writer-director Robbe-Grillet does not have the glacial perfection in technique of Alain Resnais, who helmed "Marienbad."

This manages to hold interest and should find a niche in the growing specialized art outlets in keys of depth, distrib seems extremely limited. Mook.

Union Films release of Pathe Cinema presentation of a Productions Cinematographiques film (Pierre Gerin) in association with the Comedie Francaise. With members of the Comedie Francaise. Directed by Jean Meyer. Screenplay based on play by Pierre Augustin Caron de Beaumarchais; camera (Eastmancolor), Henri Alekan; music, Wolfgang Mozart, orchestrated and adapted by Andre Cadou; editor, Claude Durand. (English Subtitles)

Comedie Francaise's second film translation of one of the works in its repertory ("The Would-Be Gentleman" was the first several years ago) is a handsome, impeccably performed production with a life expectancy that should roughly correspond with the Comedie itself. Because it is a unique screen recording of an equally unique theatrical experience, this "Marriage of Figaro" may have, at the onset, a comparatively limited U.S. market, and that, of course, in the arties, but it should go on forever in the film, educational and film society fields.

This is not to faint-praise the film. Although it is almost a literal transcription of the theatrical experience, it subtly manages to recreate on screen the excitement of the theatre without being a flat-ly filmed play. It unravels with a buoyant, opera comique pace, and the camera moves with the action without ever self-consciously zooming in, out and around in an attempt to "open up" the Beaumarchais original. The Comedie Francaise intention was to preserve, on film, a classic heritage, and this has been done without fear or condescension.

Because the credits don't list an adapter, it must be assumed the screenplay is the stage prompt copy. Thus, director Jean Meyer, who also performs in the film, must be credited for the film's unusual, as well as faithful, cinematic grace. While much of Beaumarchais' satire is inevitably lost in this hydrogen age, the tale of tangled seductions, revolving around the irrepressible title character, still retains a lot of mischievous fun and, to one jaded reviewer, a surprising number of real laughs. Key roles are beautifully played by Jean Piat, as Figaro; Micheline Boudet, as his fiancee; Georges Descrieres, as their bored employer, who intends to exercise his droit du seigneur with Miss Boudet; and Yvonne Gaudeau, as Descrieres' unhappy wife.

Adding to the purely sensual enjoyment of the film are the lovely Eastmancolor photography, Suzanne Lalique's eyedibbing sets and costumes, to say nothing of the music provided by a cinematic unknown by the name of Wolfgang Mozart. Abby.

Paris, April 26.

Unidex release of Georges Cherchi-Mediterranee Films Films Mazar Films production. Stars Marina Vlady, Bourvil, Virna Lisi, Pierre Brasseur. Witness	Jacques Marchais

Film uses a look at the inside workings of French justice on which to hang a cynical, insouciant tale of shabby characters that use justice for their own ends and the few honorable ones beaten by it. But it refrains from true comment or attitude towards the subject. This is mainly a slick playoff item with arty chances abroad possible.

A venal woman dispatches her husband by subbing a fatal content to a vial being injected into him. It seems that the young nurse has become his mistress. She then beds down with a theatrical but successful lawyer with whom she had a prior affair. When he wins the case for her she leaves him.

Larded into this is a simple, honest magistrate who gives up examining the case when he finds himself beaten by the devious lawyer. A plea in court does no good either. The moral seems to be that life is mealy, dishonest, and it is no use fighting it—so get what you can out of it. This would be acceptable if the satire were pungent and the outlook angry.

But this surefootedly exploits the affair for macabre humor and unsavory plumbing of the character's lives, motivations and actions. Marina Vlady has the right blase, dimwitted cruelty for her lovely double crossing wife role. Pierre Brasseur is the hammy, larger than life mouthpiece.

Bourvil and Virna Lisi do not fare so well as the decent people overwhelmed by their Machiavellian adversaries. Director Christian-Jaque has given this a brittle, sharp envelope with technical credits controlled and brisk. There is a ruthlessly wry aspect to this tale that might have it as exploitation item abroad.

This has a bit too much talk to bring it off properly. Some pruning could give this glossy item better offshore playoff chances. Mook.

Yet another of the interminable permutations of pix that will be dug up from the last World War. It adds up to a reasonably sound dualer but it lacks the drive that more incisive direction and writing could have given to an interesting situation.

A Nazi U-Boat, one of a wolf pack all set to attack a British convoy, is captured by the British. A British admiral (James Robertson Justice) hits on an idea which it's hoped will reveal the location of the pack. He orders Edward Judd, a fearless, unconventional submarine commander, to take over the German U-Boat, man it with a British crew and then join the wolf pack and signal its locality. Judd takes over the suicide assignment with stiff upper lip and tides everything up despite attacks by the Germans, the unsuspecting RAF bombers and a British frigate.

Film has been made with more competence than inspiration, for C. Pennington-Richards' direction lacks a sense of urgency. Stock shots have been welded into the narrative fluidly while art and camera work are both creditable. The thesps have little chance to be anything more than stock characters but several of them make the most of limited opportunity.

Judd tackles his chore doggedly and provides one of the two most interesting performances. The other is Arthur O'Sullivan's lively, zestful interpretation of a cantankerous civilian engineer from "neutral" Ireland.

James Robertson Justice, Robert Flemyng, Albert Lieven, Robert Brown, Peter Myers, Leslie Randall and Gerald Heinz are among the long, virtually all-male cast which, professionally, contrives to prevent the proceedings from becoming too sluggish. Rich.

Swedish filmmaker Erwin Leiser follows his initial two full-length documentaries on the atrocities of the Nazi regime, "Mein Kampf" and "Eichmann and the Third Reich" ("Murder Through Signature" in Britain), with a third pic called the "first feature-length documentary on the situation of man in the atomic age." Leiser says he wants this film to be understood as a human, not a political document.

"Waehle das Leben" is an indie production by Leiser, with Swiss lawyer and publisher, Hans Deutsch, who provided much of the financing. The 18 months of filming and editing took place in Japan, Mexico, U.S. and Switzerland, complemented by material from U.S. archives plus American, Japanese, French, British and German sources, most of it new.

The film opens with a short Mexican sequence depicting the people's completely natural and basically fearless acceptance of life and death, blends into a fleeting reminiscence of Nazi horrors as history's most gruesome example of mass destruction. Film then settles down for the remain-

Pay Negotiations Retard Vancouver's Embrace of Sunday Film Privilege

Vancouver, May 7.

Sunday films went into effect in Vancouver April 28 but only a handful of customers turned up at the two theatres open in the downtown area. Other city houses remained closed pending settlement of current wage negotiations with employees. Projectionists have recently concluded new pacts calling for 20% increases for suburban theatre employees and 10% for members in downtown houses. Ushers, cashiers, doormen and janitors have not reached agreement with the operators on the issue of Sunday pay.

The city bylaw permitting Sabbath entertainment for which an admission fee is charged was given final reading April 23 and legalized the amendment to the city charter passed at the last session of the provincial legislature after a plebiscite in December carried by a count of 67,000 votes to 35,000. Passage of the measure culminated an eight-year battle of petitions and plebiscites spearheaded by the British Columbia Exhibitors Assn. and irony of the situation revolves around the position operators now find themselves in.

Wording of the enabling bylaw covers films, theatrical performances, concerts, lectures or any other exhibitions or performances, and stipulates that events cannot start before 1:30 p.m. but there is no restriction on when they may end. The Sunday sport bylaw calls for athletic events it covers to observe a 6 p.m. curfew. Entertainment bylaw also bans the use of loudspeakers or conduct likely to disturb the peace.

City council has reserved the right to debate possible limitations of permissable entertainments since some councillors feel the section referring to "any other exhibitions or performances" may be too broad, although city legal counsel say the clause implies that th performances must be of a nature similar to the movies or theatrical events named specifically. Until this point is categorically clarified, however, there is considerable room for argument over the council's power to permit some performances and prohibit others

George Chakiris will appear opposite Claudia Cardinale in "La Ragazza di Bube" (Bebe's Girl), slated to start shooting early in May in Tuscany.

Based on the book by Carlo Cassola, "Bebe's Girl" will be directed by Luigi Comencini on locations which inspired the book. Video Films of Rome produces.

AIR FRANCE CANCELS, SHAFUS SDGC'S PLANS

A plan whereby 120 members of the Screen Directors International Guild were to fly to the Cannes Film Festival by specially-chartered Air France jet was scuttled last week when the airline cancelled the charter. Most of the group is still going to the Fest, which opens tomorrow (Thurs.), but they have had to make private arrangements which are costing about 10% more than the charter rate.

Resultantly, there will be no SDGC delegation at Cannes as such. Reason for the Air France cancellation arises out of some squabbling between the International Air Transportation Assn. and the Civil Aeronautics Board involving some price warring presently going on between various airlines over charter jobs. SDGC had made a similar trip to Cannes two years ago, by charter, at the 10% reduction.

Guild members naturally had reservations for accommodations etc. in France and so most are scurrying around to get transportation overseas. But, once there, the makers won't assemble as a delegation; they'll just fend for themselves. The original plan was to have an official SDGC group representing the union.

Ruggoff-Lawrence Team to Import

Donald Ruggoff, head of Ruggoff Theatres, and Bob Lawrence, who has been active in European production and most recently as a tv commercial producer in the States, have joined forces to organize a new company, Cinema Five, for the import of pix from abroad. Cinema Five, with Lawrence as proxy and Ruggoff as chairman, also eventually plans to make co-production deals.

Move by Ruggoff into this field has long been rumored, but exact approach was decided only comparatively recently. The new company does not plan to handle its own physical distribution. Thus, its first release, the new Peter Sellers starrer, "Heavens Above," will go out via Janus.

Ruggoff Theatres, operates a circuit of 12 posh artics in and around New York City, including the new Cinema I and Cinema II, plus another in Philadelphia.

'Paris By Night' In Court Tiff

Los Angeles, May 7.

Superior Court has awarded plaintiff Lee Mantin damages in the amount of $50,000 in his "title plagiarism" suit against Columbia Pictures Corp. Columbia will, however, move for new trial or appeal. Judge Ellsworth Meyer presided.

Suit, filed by Mantin on April 12, 1960, accused Columbia Pictures Corp. of unlawful competition and plagiarism of the title, "Paris By Night." Asking for damages of $2,500,000, Mantin claimed that studio advertised and promoted a picture under that title to be produced as a Brigitte Bardot-Frank Sinatra co-starrer. Action then halted negotiations by Mantin for his stage shows, he alleged.

In 1959, Mantin had announced that he was negotiating with Miss Bardot to star in his "Paris By Night" musical production. Deal would have involved eight-week run for the package and would have been set hitton's American story debut.

Also a tunesmith, Mantin last month settled out-of-court a suit he had filed against the Mutual Todd Co. and United Artists over the authorship of the song, "Around The World," used in the pic, "Around The World in 80 Days." He had sought damages of $1,500,000. Amount of settlement was not disclosed.

Robert Myers, member of the law firm of Lillick, Geary, McHose, Roethke & Myers, attorneys for Columbia in the suit, informed Variety that "In our opinion, the verdict is not supported by the law or by the evidence. We expect to move for a new trial. If the motion is not carried, we expect to appeal."

'Yellow Canary' Premes DeMille on Broadway Plus 50 Other Spots

Twentieth-Fox's "The Yellow Canary," Pat Boone starrer, will premiere in New York at the DeMille Theatre on Broadway and 50 other houses throughout the metropolitan area May 15.

Although the 30 day-dating theatres are separate from those employed in the United Artists-backed Premiere Showcase, in which 20th also participates from time to time, the "Canary" opening appears to be an extension of the Showcase plan. Up to 17 theatres participate in the latter release plan.

ROBERT SCHRADER WINS (BUT NOT MUCH) 'LIBEL'

Charlotte, N.C., May 7.

Robert E. Schrader, owner-manager of the Visulite Theatre here, was awarded $100 in actual damages as a result of his libel suit against the Charlotte Observer.

A Superior Court jury deliberated 2½ hours before deciding that an editorial in the newspaper damaged Schrader's reputation.

The theatre manager had sued for $100,000 actual damages and $50,000 punitive damages as result of an editorial that appeared in 1959. The editorial followed a Recorder's Court trial in which Schrader was acquitted of violating a law against "the purposeful dissemination of obscene materials" when he showed an English-made feature of life in a nudist colony, "For Members Only."

Schrader contended that the editorial damaged his reputation and that he lost business at the theatre because of it.

ing footage to a visualization, underlined by spoken commentary, of what remains today of the survivors of Hiroshima. The fate of these people, according to Leiser, has been practically ignored by films or books so far, which explains his desire to show authentically what it means to survive an A-bomb.

The possibilities, still largely untapped, of atomic energy for peaceful purposes are also brought into focus. But as a whole the film's message boils down to an urgent and obviously sincere plea to whom it may concern, i.e. every man and woman of any nationality, to avoid another Hiroshima. Included in the commentary are such statements as "The whole world is a Hiroshima that the bomb has not hit yet," or, at the film's conclusion, "It is for all of us to decide whether mankind must die together or can live together."

Leiser deserves credit for having kept this film free of deliberate shock values or polemic tendencies. It has the ring of truth and honesty as it restricts itself to authentic shots alone (not a single staged scene is included) and can be termed politically impartial. Nevertheless, it should come as no surprise that, due to its grim and downbeat theme, its final effect upon a paying audience is as shattering that boxoffice prospects look dubious at best. For, necessary as such a film may be, few filmgoers in today's market may be expected to put their good money to be exposed to an evening's depletion of death, destruction and invalidity.

Major assets, in cinematic terms, are Swiss lens Heinrich Kuppel's intelligent editing and the top-notch black-and-white lensing by France's Jean-Marc Ripert, Tadashi Ohno and Hiroshi Segawa for the Japanese location sequences and Swiss vet cameraman Otto Ritter. Music by Robert Bloom is both haunting and evocative.

Rome, April 30.

Warner Bros. release of a Cinema production. Features Rossana Rossi, Tomas Milian, Philippe Leroy, Jean Jacques Delbo, Lilla Brignone, Mary Arden, Gino Pernice, Walter Chiari. Directed by Guglielmo Morandi. Screenplay, Pucini, Morandi, Gino Visentini, Elmo Courtney, Ennio de Concini, Renzo Renzi. Camera, Gianni Di Venanzo; editor, Mario Serandrei; Al Fiamma. Rome, Filmways time, 95 mins.

Commercial item with some deeper attempts at social criticism, not all of them successful. Cast helps locally, but this is no blockbuster. Export chances must bank on exploitable aspects.

A sort of "Dolce Vita" in reverse, pic shows the slow corruption exerted on a country gal by the big city, as she goes from one man to the next in search of one who can furnish her dream—the penthouse which symbolizes success, at least in her estimation. Much of film is played for laughs, but there are some sharp barbs thrown here and there. Result is a certain confusion in approach which added to conventional aspects of plotting are among pic's demerits.

Also, Daniela Rocca, who was up apt as the wife in "Divorce, Italian Style," is here out of her range, and since she's on screen almost throughout, film suffers, even though she has some good moments.

Though badly dubbed in local version, Tomas Milian sketches a good opportunist type while Walter Chiari appears strangely opaque in his de-gender role and lacks conviction. Mary Arden, Lilla Brignone, and others are good in support, but best turn belongs to Jean Jacques Delbo, as Chiari's father. Director Pucini has dressed this one up with some fancy leaning and pacing, but it's a disappointing entry just the same. Technical credits are good.

(FRENCH)

Paris, April 30.

Classic release of Mutuelle Union-Pathé production. Stars Fernandel. Features Arlette Poirier, Michel Galabru, Colette Brosset, Pierre Tissier, Robert Vattier. Directed by Gilles Grangier. Screenplay, Jean Manse, Maurice Vaer and Grangier from a play by Jean Bernard-Luc. At the Normandie, Paris. Running time, 90 mins.

Mousey little pic gives comic Fernandel a chance to run his gamut of rustic charm and anger, with a dash of pathos. Simple plotting and obvious characters, with a pleasant unpassing, makes this a probable local bet with foreign chances limited except for possible playoff use on the Fernandel name.

Fernandel is a station master in a little town with the one train that comes through about to be deleted. A homecoming son and a cherished hope of a trip to Biarritz make up the core of the pic plus a quick trip to London when the station master wins a free voyage in a lottery.

The son is at first ashamed of his lower class dad but comes around and decides to marry a comely local miss after almost marrying a rich girl while on a London job. Pic is sensibly directed and does not try to cover up its one-dimensional, sentimental tale. It is technically polished.

There is just the lack of character perception or dramatic fillip to bring this out of the rut of the okay programmer. Production dress is good.

Pole Vaulters' Priority Over Exhibs Conclave

Albuquerque, May 7.

A college track meet has taken precedence over a statewide conclave of theatremen.

Annual state convention of the New Mexico Theatre Owners Assn., originally shedded for June 11-13 in Albuquerque, has been moved back a week, to June 18-19, because of conflict with a regional track meet set for the U. of New Mexico in Albuquerque.

Headquarters for the conclave will remain the same, the Albuquerque Hilton. Theatremen's association numbers about 100 persons. Elmo Courtney, Clovis, N.M., exhibitor, is current prexy.

Ex-Critic From Iceland Calls 'Gogo' Film Luridly Interpreted by Americans

Editor, Variety:

I have followed with interest the reports in three recent issues of your paper (April 10, April 17 and May 1) on the Icelandic film "Gogo" and the stir it has created in higher circles. While I can understand why some people have been disturbed by the fact that two American service-men are "pictured as cowards and girl-corrupters" in a film which could readily be interpreted by many as 'anti-American,' I can't help thinking that these people—including Pentagon and the Defense Department—are missing the real point.

Let me say first that not only have I seen the film, but I have also translated into English the novel upon which it is based, so that I know what I am talking about. And it is true that one American in the film is shown dead drunk and another as having an affair with a married Icelandic woman. But can we, merely on that basis, conclude that the film is "anti-American"? Let us look a little deeper.

Iceland has known American troops almost continually for the last 28 years. That is quite a long time. It would certainly be a miracle if, during that time, no soldier had taken one too many and none had any acquaintance of the local girls. The fact of the matter is that military camps, even here in the States, breed "corruption." (I must confess that I'm not very fond of this word, but use it as used by your reviewer). Wherever there is a camp, there will be some degree of prostitution and other "corruption." The young men stationed in Iceland are in no way different from those here at home, or those in other countries. If anything, they might feel a little more lonely, a little more isolated, a little more in need of mixed company. We also know that what they're after is not just conversation or a kiss on the cheek. I mean, we do know the facts of life, don't we?

Another favorite remedy for loneliness is alcohol, and sometimes the drinking becomes excessive. It has happened to men in all times and in all places, and while it may not be considered exemplary behavior, it is also a fact of life. Both the novel upon which the film is based, and the film itself, show clearly that this is the reason for the soldier's drunkenness. After seeking female company in vain, he starts drinking, helped along by two Icelandic cronies who, by the way, are not shown in any better light.

Anti-Icelandic Also?

As for the moral question, the female protagonist of the film is a married woman who is having an affair with an American Officer. Simultaneously she is carrying on with an Icelandic cab-driver. Because her husband has been confined to an asylum for a long time (he dies during the film), she also is lonely, and personally I wouldn't be able to tell who is "corrupting" whom. But while we're on the subject, shouldn't we call the cab-driver a "girl-corrupter," too? Shouldn't we, in fact, conclude that the film "could readily be interpreted" as anti-Icelandic?

Your review of April 17 states that the American service men are both "directed to act out the curse of America's 'always present sun' (sic) on the Nordic Island and behave in a way the local population clearly despises." I can't quite agree that this is the impression the film (or the novel) gives.

Nevertheless, let us once more face the facts. No people on earth like, or even think lightly of, entertaining foreign troops in their country, no matter what nationality the troops are. I should be very surprised indeed, if I heard that American soldiers were really welcome anywhere outside the States, even though their presence might be considered necessary. At best, it would be a necessary evil. We must, therefore, clearly distinguish between anti-Americanism and the feeling which is naturally opposed to harboring any foreign troops, or any foreign military bases. I disagree that the film "Gogo" is anti-American. Neither the author of the novel, nor the writer of the screenplay, both of whom I know personally, are anti-American. In fact, I believe they even think the U.S. bases in Iceland to be a necessity. But that does not—and should not—prevent them from dealing with the darker sides of the co-existence between the local population and the foreign "guests."

The action taken against the public information officer who permitted actual servicemen to participate in the film, smacks a little of superficiality, if not hypocrisy. As a matter of fact, I think the so-called "bad-light"-depiction of the U.S. military in the film is much less harmful to the American image than what actually occurs.

The two U.S. actors probably saw nothing unusual or unreal in the characters they portrayed. They were only depicting what is common knowledge in Iceland. For it is a very well known "secret" that in spite of rules demanding that every service-man on leave to Reykjavik be back at 10 p.m., many of them remain overnight, and first return to the base at Keflavik in the morning. Perhaps, it would not be irrelevant for Secretary Sylvester or Pentagon to look further into that matter, instead of making some poor PIO a scapegoat in a "scandal," at the root of which I can see nothing but an attempt to conceal what is really going on. Where do they think these service-men spend their nights—praying in a chapel? However, I shall be more than willing to leave it up to Pentagon and Congressional American-image-protectors to judge who might be "corrupting" whom.

Finally this: the "ugly American" is not to be found in the imaginary "Barbican" alone. Wherever Americans are based, he will rear his head from time to time.

I can recall several incidents of his appearance in Iceland during the last few years, but there is hardly a reason to go into that here. The crux of the matter is, that if the film "Gogo" is interpreted as an example of Icelandic anti-Americanism, it is not the fault of the two American actors or that of the PIO who gave them permission to perform, but rather a result of the basic fact that the American troops—unfortunately—are there.

Berger Wins The Absent; Uses Own Theatres To Trailerize for Park Bd.

Minneapolis, May 7.

Something different here in the way of a political campaign for public office found circuit owner Bonnie Berger, running for park board commission relying entirely in the primaries on trailers in his three theatres here.

Trailers asked the showhouse patrons to vote for him and, apparently, enough of them did to enable him to win one of the eight nominations in a field of 13. He ran fourth.

During the campaign Berger and his wife were vacationing in Europe so that he made no speeches or public appearances. He even wasn't here to vote for himself at the primaries.

GEORGES WILSON HEADS FRENCH TNP GROUP

Paris, May 7.

As predicted recently in Variety, Georges Wilson will replace Jean Vilar as head of the state subsidized Theatre National Populaire. Wilson accepted the task from Culture Minister Andre Malraux last Thursday (2). He takes over in September when Vilar exits.

Wilson, an actor-director, has succeeded Vilar for some time now at the TNP. He is now heading the cast of the last play staged by Vilar for the TNP, Robert Bolt's "A Man For All Seasons," adapted by Pol Quentin.

Wilson will present next season's plans within two months. Vilar expressed contentment that Wilson accepted to take over the TNP. Vilar may still do guest stagings for the TNP at the Avignon Fest where the new TNP entries are tried out every summer.

Did MCA Inspire Move? Guilds and Crafts Angles

Hollywood, May 7.

Open to speculation here is whether the 20th-Metro-Columbia plan was inspired by MCA Inc., as parent company of Revue-Universal-Decca combine, modernizing its studio plant to stem, or recognition that present-day studio establishments are white elephants to most companies.

First giant step toward modernization of a studio is now well underway at Revue-Universal plant, and in many areas of that redevelopment project building is being done from ground up. One source said that the premise of the three companies agreed it would be more economic to share costs of a wholly new studio on a scale larger than any company might be able to afford individually if it were to invest in modernization of present properties.

Screen Actors Guild, which would be affected by the move, views this announcement as evidence of forward-looking leadership in the industry," declared proxy George Chandler. "Improved and modern motion picture production facilities in the Hollywood area should help greatly to increase production here."

One immediate problem for SAG, Screen Extras Guild and IATSE craft unions would be a redefinition of zone regulations in basic contract with industry. Zone now regulates studio area within which employees report to work without being paid travel time.

Malibu site now is outside the zone described as being within circle having a six-mile radius from Fifth and Rossmore Streets in Los Angeles.

At present when 20th is shooting at Malibu performers and craft workers check in at studio and are on salary while travelling to and from beach area. Disney studio and Columbia ranch in Burbank, and Republic studio (recently renamed Studio Center by CBS which now holds long-term lease on property) are specifically mentioned as being within the zone in current basic contracts.

Tone of SAG statement by Chandler might be interpreted as indication that union would be willing to consider removal or modification of this obstacle.

Big Realty Windfall

Venture could also enable Columbia and Metro to make big real estate killing by selling property, which today is worth many, many times the original cost. That either or both companies might sell their present realestate is, of course, in the realm of speculation.

Twentieth in 1951 sold its 260 acres to Aluminum Co. of America for $43,000,000 and leased back 75 acres of its main studio facilities for 99 years at annual rental of $1,200,000, plus taxes. At end of five years 20th can sublease any or all of 75 acres for "any lawful purpose."

Metro property comprises 184 acres in Culver City and in his recent statement O'Brien reported company was going to pursue a course of realestate development. Metro property is currently zoned for studio use, but large sections of Culver City are zoned for industrial purposes.

Columbia studio, in the heart of Hollywood, covers 26 acres and the Columbia ranch in Burbank 40 acres. It formerly consisted of 80 acres, but that part was sold as was another 10 acres in Hollywood that comprises the former Columbia Sunset Blvd. studio.

Possible effect that the studio complex envisioned by 20th, Metro and Columbia might have on remaining individual studios is not immediately apparent. However, threat of stiffer competition is evidence by statement that the new production centre for features and tv is planned to "accommodate, and will be available to accommodate other companies as well as independent producers."

All-Colossal Updated 'Hollywood'

in Hollywood, a community where it's virtually impossible to keep any secrets," two of the three company presidents had been conducting surveys of the 260th-Fox Ranch at Malibu—a 2,800-acre complex—not only by themselves but with their aides.

In like spirit, each chief executive, pledged to unanimity of "no comment," will not project when (a) such a proposal must go before their stockholders; (b) albeit conceding it will require months of legalistic paper work, after negotiations are finalized; (c) but will not discuss whether or not an engineering survey has been made, or when; and (d), who "fathered" the idea.

When?—Unknown

There is no timetable on when it will go to their company boards (although one executive was quizzical in his ad lib, "How do you know whether it hasn't already been so presented?").

All are agreed that this will be the biggest studio in the world (perhaps Rome's Cinecitta holds that title at the moment); that the new facilities will be equipped to accept the challenge of and fulfill the dream of a revitalization of Hollywood film production, thus pointing up anew the continuance of Hollywood as the motion picture capital of the globe.

(Hollywood will be an anachronism, much as it is today, considering that Warner Bros. is in Burbank 20th-Fox in Beverly Hills. Of this triumvirate, Columbia alone, with its major plant (as well as that of its subsidiary Screen Gems) situation on North Gower St., is in Hollywood. However, Hollywood per se is mythical; there's no such city on the Rand-McNally; like it or not the official postoffice is still Los Angeles).

It is stressed that this common production plant would not alter "the autonomy or identity" of any of the three companies; and that this goes for any and all other producers who would be invited to utilize the facilities on a rental basis.

The Century Ranch. It is stressed "is only 25 minutes from Beverly Hills."

Acreage

It is greater in size than the combined acreage of all Hollywood studios; that it has natural shrub and tree growth, as well as desert terrain, "to create a natural environment for any part in the world," and is capable of simulating any locale in the world. (Deft to "runaway" production).

A reaction to the Lew Wasserman-automated Revue Studios is also interpreted on the Coast in this attitude. Quite obviously it is to the Milton R. Rackmil-Jules C. Stein-Wasserman credit that their updating and improvement of Revue-cum-Universal studio facilities may have hastened this proposal.

(On the Coast the Screen Actors' Guild called this a "constructive" move and indicated it would waive zone clearance. This waiver it is felt, would be forthcoming from the other IATSE unions. Actually, as it stands in the presently accepted zoning (from 5th and Rossmore to Santa Monica environs), the new proposed Century Ranch locale falls six miles outside the perimeter).

Century Ranch has long been used by other producers as well as 20th-Fox. Of course this is true of all other studio facilities. There is a $700,000-cost lake which was built for 20th's "Cleopatra." Metro also used the ranch recently, and George Stevens is shooting "Greatest Story" (UA) on the lot.

Conversely, Otto Preminger wouldn't use Columbia's ranch in the Valley although his picture is a Col release; instead he is currently using a street scene at Warners and the backlot of Revue for the final scenes of his picture, which already has traversed from New England to Vienna and Rome for its locales.

The realty values are obvious. A major part of the Fox lot was sold via Webb & Knapp for $43,-000,000. When Metro invested in Culver City it was a wilderness; now it's in specialized industrial and residential territory. Columbia is right in the heart of Hollywood.

Seen As 'Fantastic'

The mind's eye blueprinting for the new studios are called "fantastic." No studio alone could afford it.

The philosophy is that the existing studios are from 30-40 years old and more. Modernizing could cost as much as new building. The completely new construction, with an eye to automation ("one little button can light up a whole stage," to quote one enthusiast), would make this the "dream" filmmaking plant of the world, geared for films or television, theatrical or payee. The timesaving devices, with concomitant reduced labor costs, are termed of incalculable value, whether or not pix are made for theatres or for some television system. (Seems generally agreed that, despite the parlous b.o. tides and fortunes of film production, there will always be an electronic outlet market for them, whether old or new).

Why and how Paramount or Warners, UA or AA, or any others have not been "invited" is answered by the statement the facilities will be available to "all" producers.

Anti-'Runaways' Also

The under-one-roof concept of production, as projected by Metro, 20th-Fox and Columbia, represents "21st Century" thinking on the top level and thing is by and large these expenditures.

Runaway filmmaking is a manifestation of too much economic stress and strain in Hollywood. Modernization is intended to mean better negative costs and "if we can make pictures for lesser amounts in the Hollywood community, this would lead to more pictures and more employment." (The quotes are from a semi-official source; presidents of the three "community-minded" companies having pledged themselves to buttoned lips.)

In other words, a friendlier fiscal climate in California especially would keep many an American global gadabout at home. In this connection it's noted that 20th's Darryl F. Zanuck and Metro's Robert H. O'Brien both are on record as distinctly favoring Hollywood except where location work is absolutely necessary.

Thus it is that an MGM-Columbia-20th filmmaking trifle would have worldwide implications, not only in providing a new attractiveness for Yank producers, but perhaps even in providing a lure for non-Yanks who would avail themselves of the modernized facilities on a rental basis.

It was further said that 20th is an "extreme example" of operating a studio on expensive land and "it's difficult to modernize our present equipment and type of construction."

The idea of merged studio facilities, of course, has been kicked about before.

Why not one wardrobe building? One sound effects department? One synchronization, scoring, orchestral and music clearance departments? Why not one single building for all writers? For directors? Even producers? Then the late Harry Cohn explained, "Yes, but if I want to score one of my pictures I don't want to hang around like some rock 'n' roller for a recording date," and that just about was the sum and substance of the studio barons who surveyed their own terrains with autocratic authority.

"But," observes another, "in this day and age you can't afford to be king of the roost any longer. You can't even afford to operate a studio."

This cost-sharing was born of that realization. As you use the facilities so shall you pay.

News of the proposed consolidation of production facilities was a complete surprise to some key executives in New York and they so expressed themselves frankly. "Usually we have an inkling of what our colleagues may be thinking," said one topper, "but this is the first I heard of it. And that answers why we weren't 'invited' to join."

George Bates' Will

Auburn, Me., May 7.

George W. Lane Jr., president of the Maine-New Hampshire Theatre Corp., left hundreds of thousands of dollars in public bequests when he died recently, according to the will filed in Androscoggin County Probate Court.

Top beneficiary is Bates College in Lewiston, which will receive $200,000. The estate is valued at $1,500,000.

YANKS O.O. AFRICAN NATIONS

NOW IS GREATNESS

By ROBERT J. LANDRY

Architect of Happy Change

It was the American Marshall Plan of 1947 which laid the groundwork for European recovery. This unprecedented act of one nation's faith in other nations took the form of a promissory note to bankrupt peoples for billions of dollars. There is no parallel in history. So present amazement with recent gains credited to the Common Market ought not to cast a shadow of forgetfulness. In its time the Marshall Plan was a joyous thing. Which is not to deny that the United States has enjoyed return satisfactions. Indeed it is entirely appropriate, in this Sixth Annual International Film Edition, to salute the Marshall Plan as the hero of U. S. film rentals in the foreign markets. Against the punishments inflicted upon Hollywood by the Dept. of Justice and television the imagination reels to contemplate what the U. S. film industry would be like today without the overseas playoff.

None More International

Meanwhile, herewith, VARIETY celebrates the vigor and versatility of the world cinema. An essential aspect of this heartening and exciting development is its two-way character. Foreign films have cracked the American market. It was not easy. In some instances it remains only tentative success. A number of producing nations are still on the outside looking in. But an enormous difference from 10 years ago is evident. The British have overcome whatever generalized Yankee audience resistance there was. U. S. theatremen have been educated to accept the fact that British product will entertain and will do business.

Hollywood and Rome

Italy and the United States have also had a peculiarly reciprocal relationship. This is Italy's second, not first, big film boom since the war. Its contributions of showmanship and enterprise have been enormous and the present text makes vivid these living truths.

The Exoterica Market

France has been a leader in exoterica (and/or erotica) and its product has borne a distinctive mark always. It's own domestic difficulties show that film industry in any country tends to suffer from identical complaints as in other lands. Attendance is down in France and the reason is television. That goes for Germany, Denmark, Switzerland, Holland, et al.

Stirring in Spain

One of the most provocative feature stories in the present issue is Hank Werba's prospectus for Spain. It will be fascinating to see in the years immediately ahead whether the same sort of turbulence that gathered at Rome will bring a big production surge in Madrid. If Samuel Bronstein has been the rugged pioneer there it is now a big colony of filmmakers, recruited from Hollywood, London, Paris, Rome and elsewhere and making the point—if any need to make it remains—that the international film medium always comes up roses.

Problems Are Everywhere

Obviously there are great differences between producing nations. Hollywood's worried Coast Guards may lack the necessary philosophic detachment to derive much consolation but the present text confirms the universality of anguish. The film medium is always a triumph over probabilities. Interestingly, there are also problems in the studios of Russia, Poland, Hungary.

Asiatics Look West

One of the challenges these days is the quest of Asiatic film industries for western playoff. Japan is displaying remarkable skills cinematically. But beyond earlier succes d'estimes, the Japanese are taking practical steps to showcase and merchandise their films. Even India has made some progress in the west via the "Apu Trialogy" and so on. Features made in Manila and Hong Kong are seen in the U. S.

A Great Entertainment Medium

And so amen to the Marshall Plan and amen, too, to the innate survival qualities of the motion picture. It has taken 400 blows, and more, and still rejoices in plans, projects and international coproduction of every sort and combination. It is impossible thoughtfully to read the present text without experiencing a surge of confidence in the motion picture.

Foreign Features Licensed by N.Y.

The Motion Picture Division at Albany of the New York State Education Dept. reviewed a total of 723 features and shorts from abroad in the 12-month period ended March 31, 1963. Of this total, 604 were features and 120 were shorts. This compares with a total of 728 films approved in the 1961-1962 period, of which 587 were features and 141 were shorts.

The following is a country-by-country breakdown as to features reviewed in the 1962-63 period. Comparable figures for 1961-62 are in parentheses.

ORIGIN	FEATURES
Hong Kong	106 (132)
Mexico	75 (80)
Italy	70 (70)
France	54 (43)
Great Britain	53 (48)
Greece	47 (20)
Germany	33 (54)
USSR	17 (20)
Spain	14 (14)
Japan	14 (13)
Austria	10 (9)
Argentina	10 (20)
Sweden	6 (6)
Puerto Rico (USA)	3 (11)
Egypt	3 (2)
Switzerland	3 (..)
India	3 (...)
Yugoslavia	3 (2)
Lebanon	3 (..)

In addition, there were nine features of mixed (coproduction) heritage, and the following countries were repped by one picture each: Canada, Israel, Cuba, Brazil, Philippines, Norway, Ireland, Taiwan, Poland, Arabia, Tahiti, Venezuela and Denmark.

MAIN NEW MPEA MARKET QUEST

By VINCENT CANBY

Motion Picture Assn. of America, having focussed its attention last year on the launching of its distribution subsidiary in the former British West African territories, now is turning its attention on the 13 newly independent countries which formerly composed the French West African empire. Stretching north and east from the coastal areas around western Africa's "bulge," it's a vast, sprawling territory comprising tropical jungle, highlands and Saharan desert with, according to educated estimates, a total population of about 40,000,000 people.

Basis of any concerted MPAA development policy towards this territory will undoubtedly be an unprecedented survey, underwritten by the MPAA during the past year with the cooperation of the French government, and presented to the foreign managers at a special meeting in New York Thursday (25) by S. Frederick Gronich, MPAA's Paris rep. Contents of the survey are being guarded as "confidential" for the time being ("Why should we let potential competitors know what we now know?"). However, if it's half as detailed as it's supposed to be, there may not be much which the MPAA doesn't now know about—say—Senegal, Mali, Mauretania, Guinea, Ivory Coast, Upper Volta, Niger, Togo, Dahomey, Chad, Cameroun, Central African Republic and the Republic of the Congo.

No Second Lagos

Gronich's presentation to the MPAA foreign managers included a country-by-country, city-by-city, theatre-by-theatre breakdown of the former French colonies, complete even to the inclusion of colored slides showing theatre locations, plus data on seating capacity, projection equipment and average weekly receipts.

It's understood the MPAA does not envision the setting up of any kind of collective distrib operation, in the French territory, as it now has in its American Motion Picture Export Co. (Africa), with headquarters in Lagos, Nigeria. Explanation is that the problems in the two areas are different: there was nothing previously in existence in the British territories which remotely resembled an orderly distribution set-up. The 13 former French colonies, on the other hand, have been serviced via two circuits, Comacico and Secma, which buy product in Paris. Common to both territories is the lack of theatres. In all these 14 newly independent French colonies there are today no more than 105 35m theatres, and perhaps 90 16m operations, servicing the aforementioned 40,000,000 people.

Cure of Market

Approximately half of that entire market is repped by Senegal and Ivory Coast, with just three cities, Dakar, Abidjan and Brazzaville (Republic of Congo), dominating the market as far as films are concerned.

Purpose of the MPAA's survey—though this is still unstated—is to provide the information to members companies should they decide to start selling pix on an individual basis. Also, information, should

San Francisco's 'We-Were-Early Buffs' Boast Respecting Imported Product

By JAMES ESTES

San Francisco.

Art film houses in San Francisco have a long and successful history. "La Ronde," an example of sophisticated French filmmaking, played here (about 12 years ago) for over a year before New York's censorship was vested. In short, San Francisco is no Johnny-come-lately to imports.

Theatremen shy from specifying themes and best-bets for trade here, take refuge in the cover-all of "quality." Names are a spotty value. The great push is usually word-of-mouth, independent of exploitation.

Robert Little, West Coast head of Art Theatre Guild, which operates the 750-seat Presidio Theatre, "A Taste of Honey" as his most successful entry in a year. Comparing San Francisco and Los Angeles art houses, Little mentioned his current "Girl With the Golden Eyes," which opened quietly and did $3,500 the first week, $3,000 the second, $1,500 the third. In Los Angeles, he said, it was necessary to add a second feature to the bill to keep the house busy.

"Girls's" success here may have been helped by its previous showing at the '61 San Francisco Film Festival and local publicity then.

Little warned of two trends visible in foreign filmmaking: efforts to inject sex unnecessarily, and the tendency to fall into a formula (a la the "Carry On" English series).

San Francisco's physical compactness makes things easy for the art house operator with a good product: a customer is never very far away from the boxoffice, he pointed out. But by the same token, he isn't very far from the other man's boxoffice, either.

Such films as "La Dolce Vita," are cited by several Bay Area exhibitors as "sports" or oddities in the field which become conversation pieces. "Last Year in Marienbad" was another such film, which, though most people did not understand it, was successful.

Hal Honore, of the Clay, Larkin and Music Hall Theatres, echoed the sentiment that sensation alone is not enough to keep foreign films going; basically, audiences want solid entertainment. Entertainment, he said, need not be either spectacle or sensation. As examples he cited his current features: "David and Lisa," "Sundays and Cybele," "Wrong Arm of the Law." All three are basically intimate pictures.

Double-Dating

Cannes, May 7.

In order to pacify producers who used to complain when their films were given an afternoon screening during the fest here, instead of what was considered a more posh evening slot, fest authorities this year have scheduled two evening screenings, one at 8 pm. and 11 p.m. This will allow each of the two competing pix unspooled each day to have a "prestige" unveiling—meaning that audiences have to wear evening clothes.

For the benefit of the press and others who may not want to see doubleheader at night, both pix will get an additional screening earlier in the day.

A Cannes Cluster: Embassy Echelon

Embassy Pictures is mapping an all-out sales onslaught for this year's Cannes Film Festival, which opens tomorrow (Thurs.). Not only will several of the company's key execs be there personally, but the distrib has also taken special office space apart from its living suites which will be staffed and designed for a hefty sales push.

Leonard Lightstone, Embassy exec v.p., arrives at Cannes today (Wed.). Also making the scene are Bob Edwards, the company's Rome-based foreign v.p., and Ken Hargraves of the distrib's London office. As a special touch, Embassy is also importing secretaries from its Rome office to staff the special layout at the Hotel Carlton.

Embassy prez Joseph E. Levine will arrive at the Fest at its mid point next week, he being presently tied up on the Coast with production conference at Paramount in connection with "The Carpetbaggers" which they're coproducing.

The company has two pix in the Fest itself, both Italian. One, "Queen Bee," is the official Italo entry. The other is Federico Fellini's "8½," which will have the honor of closing the festivities. In all, Embassy will be attempting to sell some 22 features during the Cannes run and will have prints of all completed product on hand for screening for potential customers. Of course, there will be the usual round of parties and such functions.

Last year the distrib had four pictures showing in the Fest but operated for sales and social purposes out of individual's suites. The office idea is something of an innovation at Cannes, which is rapidly developing into the hottest single foreign sales event of the year. Embassy racked up heavy sales last year and is looking, natch, to top its income this semester. For one thing, there'll be a sign in the lobby to help customers to find their way to the special offices.

Universal Out Front at Cannes

Cannes, May 7.

Usually at film fests, or at least at Cannes, which begins Thurs. (9), Metro and 20th-Fox have been the U.S. majors most involved, with United Artists and Columbia runnerups, Paramount showing okay and Universal primarily absent. This year U carries the ball for the first time.

Its new policy of more realistic quality fare has brought U right into the fest ken, and at the Cannes Fest, May 9-23, it has the official U.S. entry in "To Kill a Mockingbird" as well as teeing off the fest with the non-competing "The Birds."

So the local U brass will get its first initiation to fests with its cocktails, parties, handling stars and creators of the pix, relations with the press and the inevitable sweating out of the prizes. U also already holds down the U.S. official slot at the Berlin Film fest with John Huston's "Freud" and may be heard from at Moscow, Venice et al.

Drive-Ins Spread: 800 to 5,000

U.S. Theatre Totals Since War Off by 1,200—But Cinerama, Art and Offbeat Policies Build Total

Theatres have undergone extremely rapid changes in the United States since the war. Scores, and probably hundreds, of the old outsize movie palaces erected during the bond-selling madness of the 1920s have either been razed or their unreasonably large capacities drastically reduced, as at the Capitol in Times Square district.

Meanwhile there has been despite all adversities and discouragements, a small "boomlet" in new, modest-capacity houses, as on the east side of Manhattan Island. Houses specializing in offbeat and art product, European or American, have grown. The spread of Cinerama and other film temples to widescreen product has likewise been notable.

Motion Picture Assn. of America data presents 18,500 as the theatre census for 1948. Today the estimate is 16,700. The significant factor is not the loss of 1,200 situations from the total count but the marked increase in outdoor automobile theatres from around 800 at the end of the war to over 5,000 drive-ins at the present writing.

New Mexico: Brit. Fun Features Succeed Best; 'Marienbad' Real Puzzler

By CHUCK MITTLESTADT

Albuquerque, N. Mex.

Aside from Mexican and occasionally Argentine and other latin product in Spanish-language houses, Albuquerque is a comparatively new market for foreign films. It is a market yet to be developed but of good potential. Nearby University of New Mexico, with a growing enrollment (more than 8,000 students) is the natural spot to promote and develop such a market. Add also egghead scientists at local atomic installations.

Art and foreign films have been a growing factor on local scene for about two years, and while still in this embryo stage, audiences are starting to develop.

As a result, the lighter comedies and the sex pix are still the safest at the boxoffice for the city's two regular art houses.

Both are located within walking distance of campus. Oldest is Lobo Arts Theatre, 604-seat house owned and operated by Albuquerque Theatres Inc., a subsidiary of Frontier Theatres of Dallas. It was built in 1936, and has been used as a class house and showplace for roadshows, specials and art films. It started an erratic booking of foreign films, when Don Pancho's Art Theatre was opened with an exclusive art policy. The 250-seat Don Pancho's was acquired about a year ago by Louis Sher's chain of arties.

The houses are competitive, but managers of both agree that light comedies are still best at the boxoffice.

Ed Lawrence, manager of Don Pancho's, and Louis Gasparini, city manager (at time of the interview) for Albuquerque Theatres, which operates Lobo, agreed on names like Peter Sellers, Alec Guinness, and Terry-Thomas and the British "Carry On" gang as solid and substantial boxoffice names that draw.

Lawrence, who managed an Art Theatre Guild house in Ohio before coming to Albuquerque, feels the reason for this is that the market is still relatively undeveloped.

"Strictly for novelty value, the public is also interested in church themes and ribald sex," Lawrence says, and he feels "this is a typical aspect of a new budding art film audience, that will wane as audiences get more educated to more substantial and meaty themes."

It goes without saying, but both theatremen volunteered the name of Brigitte Bardot as always a good draw. No theme is really regarded as repulsive locally, all are still looked on at novelty value.

'Never On Sunday' 2 Years

But, if it can be considered a criterion, the Santa Fe Arcndiocese of the Catholic Church has put a ban on Don Pancho's, because of their initial screening of "Never on Sunday" two years ago. The ban has remained on the theatre, ever since, despite repeated attempts to get it lifted.

Lawrence has tried to get personal audiences with Archbishop Edwin V. Byrne, without success. The ban remains, but Lawrence still feels his own house policy is best to police the theatre. He forbids children under 18 to attend the theatre, with or without adults, and has had very little trouble in that respect.

The Archbishop's ban, incidentally, has never been applied against Albuquerque Theatres' Lobo Arts, probably because they've been cautious, and have never gotten into running the Legion of Decency condemned films, and have stayed with the British imports generally.

As far as actually selling pictures, the hardest one in local pictures, the hardest one in local history to peddle was the booking of "Last Year At Marienbad" at Don Pancho's. Gasparini argues that the average American doesn't give a hoot about foreign films. Average American, he says, dotes on happy endings and as result just don't dig "realism" of European pix. He feels such pix are limited to a select "art" audience.

Baltimore Grievance For Early '63; N.Y. Importers Stalled by News Strike

By LOU CEDRONE

Baltimore.

Local exhibitors of art films differ as to what they want and don't want from overseas. But one thing is certain: they want and need more foreign film product.

Howard Wagonheim, manager of the Schwaber Theaters (Cinema, 5 West and Playhouse), town's leading art houses, says that in his estimation the last six months have been the worst six he has seen since he opened the Playhouse some 12 years ago. Some of this he blames on the weather, and some on the fact that N.Y. importers were holding back features because of the New York newspaper strike.

Wagonheim favors more of the better British comedies and suspense films. And more good Peter Sellers films. Latter has been making so many films of late that his draw here has thinned with uneven quality and perhaps over-exposure.

Brigitte Bardot is now at low ebb. Her biggest draw still remains "And God Created Woman." Marcello Mastroianni is hot at present. "Divorce, Italian Style" did brisk business at the Charles but "Bell' Antonio" with its impotence theme died at the Cinema. It is not a Baltimore obsession.

What Jack Fruchtman, who owns both standard and art houses, would like to see, is more of Melina Mercouri, more of Sophia Loren, more of Fellini, more of "La Dolce Vita" and more of product with backing by Joseph Levine.

Fruchtman, who played "Boccaccio '70" to big biz at both his Charles and Crest houses, is high on Fellini and any of the Italian producers who can give more of the same or another "Two Women" which he played at his Mayfair to good trade.

He's also eager to see more British films. "They're your best bet right now," he said, "but the Italians are closing in."

When it comes to dubbing, Wagonheim and Fruchtman are on opposite sides of the fence. Wagonheim prefers the undubbed product, saying his patrons resent the dubbed versions as a kind of condescension. Fruchtman, on the other hand, prefers them dubbed saying his patrons want their foreign films with English dialogue. "They can't understand it and it's too much trouble for them to read the subtitles," he said.

Ingmar Bergman films are still big here.

Taking it country by country, England seems to do best with Italy second, France third, Germany fourth and the others, including Spain, Sweden, Russia and Japan, tying for fifth.

IS PAROCHIAL DENVER SUCCUMBING TO 'ART'?

By T. BIDWELL McCORMICK

Denver.

It varies with the market and the individual showman in America. Here in Denver, F. Larry Goodenough, manager of the Vogue Art Theatre sees the appetite for foreign films well developed. He sees a heightened sophistication among filmgoers, a reaction to travel and ideas, a decline in the old "isolation" of the midcountry.

Some significance should attach to this viewpoint for the Denver of yesteryear was notorious for disinterest in things foreign. Or so the legend of the old Bonfils journalism would have it. It was cut-in-a-three country and who cared what European king had been assassinated. Not so now, it would appear.

Until recently there were only two foreign film or art houses, the Esquire (Fox) and Vogue (Art Theatre Guild) but now the latter company has added the 230-seat Capri and the 400-seat, Paris, the latter complete with "sidewalk cafe."

Don Roberts, executive booker for the Wolfberg chain says they never go in for them, this policy generally applies to the other first-runs also which stick to the Hollywood product, including basically American films shot abroad.

Fox Intermountain, which operates the Esquire, doesn't even book its foreign films locally. That chore is handled out of its Beverly Hills office by Emmett Shane.

Stephen Moser of Fox Intermountain declares: "Denver audiences seem to prefer the British comedy. The success of the "carry on" series has led to a general acceptance of this subtle, although slapstick-type of humor. British dramas are also well accepted and are noted for their frankness in the treatment of the subject matter. The French film seems to have lost some appeal. Italian films are slowly gaining a foothold in Denver. 'La Dolce Vita,' naturally had a great deal to do with it, but such names as Marcello Mastroianni, Claudia Cardinale, Vittorio de Sica and Toto are getting to be known. Such directors as Fellini, Antonioni and Bolognini are recognized.

"The German film is, at the present, practically non-existent. Such German actresses as Romy Schneider and Christine Kaufmann, and such actors as Horst Buchholz and Karl Boehm are making films in and for other countries.

"Here Swedish films means Ingmar Bergman. Some of his actors, though, have been noted. Max von Sydow, Mai Zitterling and Ingrid Thulin, for example.

"Japanese films have had poor reception in Denver, hurt, some think, by the dubbing. Spanish, Greek and Scandinavian films have had little impact.

HOW CENSORS WORK IN U.S. STATES & CITIES

Censorship of feature films continues a threat in the United States, but on individual state and individual city lines. A series of victories in the courts, notably the U. S. Supreme Court, during the 1950s has staggered but not dispersed the forces of "reform."

Some considerable part of the prevailing hostility has been focused upon films from Europe, especially Italy and France. Middle class and church elements feel that sex is treated too loosely, issues of right and wrong are confused or sullied by "decadent" viewpoints. Those three minutes of passion in "The Lovers" hit one state, Ohio, a former haven of censorship, with earthquake impact. It looked like Ohio might, for a time, declare war on France.

States with censorship still: New York, Maryland, Virginia, Kansas.

Cities requiring prior review and license: Chicago, Evanston, Illinois; Pasadena, Cal.; Atlanta, Ga.

Cities with censor review but no licensing: Spokane, Wash.; Detroit; Little Rock, Ark.; Memphis, Tenn.; Providence, R.I.; Birmingham, Alabama.

Censorship proposals defeated recently: Nevada, Texas, Nebraska, Ohio.

Film industry fees paid yearly to censors: New York State, $300,000; Maryland, $65,115; Chicago, $40,030; Virginia, $43,017; Kansas, $38,175.

Vancouver: Good Town for Imports

Dubbing Helps, Though Criticized — Homosexuality Not B.O. — Like British Comedies

By SAM SHAW

Vancouver.

Sex, sin and spectacle—not always inseparable and not always necessarily in this order—are the key content factors in the boxoffice success of foreign film features, as far as Vancouver audiences are concerned. Also, it's the story, not the star, that counts most with local customers, according to the theatremen most acutely concerned.

While foreign product is a minority of the fare offered locally, it does attract a significant and selective clientele for two of metropolitan Vancouver's 26 downtown, suburban, and drive-in theatres, plus a fair modicum of business for the occasional bookings in the larger downtown chain houses. Vancouver also has a thriving nonprofit film society of 1,400 members, second only to Toronto in size in Canada.

The 400-seat Studio, managed for the past 15 years by Sidney Freedman, is located in the heart of Vancouver. Independently owned by Toronto interests (and booked from that city) it is almost exclusively devoted to foreign pix, including British films, although these latter are hardly considered "foreign" in Canada and particularly in this area. The "foreign" tag here is taken to cover product from Continental Europe, Asia and South America.

"No matter what anyone says," says Freedman, "anything we play with a strong sex element always does well. It's been proven time and time again." He specifically cites such pix as "Room At The Top," "Never On Sunday," "A Cold Wind In August," "A Taste Of Honey" and his current "Divorce, Italian Style," which is now in its second month. Ingmar Bergman's obsession with sin and punishment has also proved popular at the Studio, according to Freedman. "All Bergman films do nicely," he says "and 'Wild Strawberries' and 'The Virgin Spring' did exceptionally nice business."

Standard Type

Freedman is also strong for British comedies of the Peter Sellers and Terry-Thomas ilk. But his customers also turned thumbs down on "The Trial Of Oscar Wilde," an indication to Freedman that homosexuality as a theme is unattractive. Overtones are tolerated, as with "A Taste Of Honey," but for optimum results he-she sex is required. What Freedman would like most, of course, is another "Room At The Top," which set the house long run record of 28 weeks.

Freedman was quite specific about the dubbed versus sub-titled question. "While we are the only downtown house with a small but steady clientele who attend regularly, regardless of title or whether the film is dubbed or titled," he says, "we have to face up to the realities of downtown competition. Because of our main street overhead we have to cater to the transient trade and we are therefore compelled to be more commercial than artistic if we want to survive. Over the long haul we find dubbed versions do much better, although there are occasional exceptions we can exploit like 'Boccaccio '70'." The sub-titled version of "Boccaccio '70", which had first broken at Famous Players' Stanley Theatre in its hard-ticket run as a dubbed film, was played up by Freedman as going "for the first time at regular prices and in its original form" and did far better business in a four-week Studio stand on a pro-rata basis than in its three month roadshow engagement.

Return of 'Gigi'

Freedman cites this but also notes that the multi-Academy Award winner "Gigi" did nothing spectacular in its original downtown run at the 2,300-seat Capitol Theatre. Brought into the Studio and given this house's special type of exploitation, "Gigi" chalked up a solid 12 weeks in its second run. And Freedman is proud of the fact that the Studio was the only theatre in Canada to do well with the British "Expresso Bongo."

Donald Barnes has managed the suburban Varsity Theatre, an Odeon Theatres of Canada house, for the past three years. Under Barnes' guidance the Varsity, also a 400-seater, has switched from its former policy of second-and-third-hand runs of domestic American product to a planned program of artie films, with the emphasis on festival award winners. Barnes agrees with Freedman that sex is often an important boxoffice element, but only if it serves a basic story purpose, and never sex for sex' sake.

"Sex helps," he says, "but doesn't make a movie in the Varsity." What Barnes looks for first is film festival quality since this house is located near the campus gates of the University of British Columbia and caters to a highly selective audience. It is also an articulate audience, made up of groups that will emerge from a film showing and argue endlessly about the meaning of the picture they have just seen. Because of these spirited discussions, Barnes finds, the Varsity benefits greatly from a high percentage of repeat business.

Steady Clientele

While the Varsity (like the Studio) has its hard core of steady customers, newsletters announcing coming attractions are used to advantage and the mailing list is carefully controlled. To get on it people must first write in and Barnes makes a habit of following up with personal contact. Coffee is also served in the lobby, an artie touch.

No dubbed prints are booked into the Varsity and Barnes is as specific on this point as Freedman. "We are more an art house and our people are too selective to put up with bad dubbing. We find we can rebook a film that has been shown downtown in the dubbed version and our sub-titled play will still hold up," he says. He named "Two Women" as an example, and adds that many of his customers make a definite point of skipping the first play if it is dubbed in favor of waiting for the subsequent sub-titled booking.

On themes that are unattractive to his patrons Barnes is not too sure that subject matter is a determining factor but agrees that homosexuality doesn't go. "The odd phone call complaint comes in about what is felt to be overemphasis of sex or sin in some of our films," he says, "but we have not been harassed to any extent by any organized protest pressure nor has there been any suggestion that our films are a threat to local morality."

Special types of promotion by the Varsity include foreign films for children every Saturday morning with prints mostly 16mm, supplied by the National Film Board of Canada or through the Vancouver Community Arts Council.

Appended hereto is a selective list of releases that have played this account. Number in parenthesis indicates the engagement in weeks.

MORE LIKE, LESS LIKE, OR BETTER THAN—

[MEANING HOLLYWOOD PICTURES]

By MORRY ROTH

Chicago.

Depending upon which one you talk to, Chi theatremen who deal in foreign product either want them (a) more like Hollywood films or (b) less like Hollywood films. Whichever their viewpoint, if they had their druthers, they would want them better than Hollywood films. If that kind of signal-calling is not enough to give a Nouvelle Vague producer malaise, then perhaps the following survey of several of Chi's top buyers of international pictures will help.

The participants: Chuck Teitel, owner of the World and Town art houses, the Globe (suburban), and also a distributor; Bruce Trinz, co-owner of the new suburban Edens hardtop and co-owner of the Clark theatre in the Loop, one of the few known houses in the country that changes a double bill every day in the year; and Joe Feulner, buyer and booker for H&E Balaban Corp., owners of Surf and Esquire first-run art houses and also nabe theatres.

Can a director's name on a foreign film guarantee biz?

Teitel: "It can't insure it, but if the picture is made by Antonioni, Vadim or Fellini, it helps."

Trinz: "Many of my customers will come to see a picture solely because it was made by Bergman, De Sica or Truffault."

Feulner: "No effect at all. I cite you Jack Clayton, who skyrocketed with 'Room At The Top' and fizzled at the boxoffice with 'The Innocents.' Either it's a good picture or it's not."

Do stars in foreign films affect biz as much as they do in U. S. pictures?

Teitel: "They're not quite as important in attracting foreign film customers. Marcello Mastroianni and Jeanne Moreau seem to be very hot with the art film addicts currently."

Trinz: "I guess I attract a lot of what you might call 'art buffs'. They like such pros as De Sica, Jean Gabin and Raf Vallone. Many of the Peter Sellers reruns do very well."

Feulner: "The influence of the star status of a foreign actor or actress on American business is fading fast. I'll give you two examples that used to be sure things and now are dependent upon the quality of the picture—Brigitte Bardot and Gina Lollobrigida. There are many others in the same boat."

There are certain areas where the trio do agree:

(1) Newspaper and magazine criticism influence foreign films more than domestic pix because the people who go to foreign pictures are usually more literate and thusly more inclined to be swayed by reviews;

(2) Foreign picture makers are getting the "Hollywood syndrome" of following their smash successes with carbon copies of it. Feulner: "One more 'Room At The Top' and I'll blow my top";

(3) Sin, sex and nudity still help at the boxoffice, but their impact is being diminished as the novelty wears off, and also as competition in these areas increases from U. S. producers as censorship attitudes become more liberal.

Countries other than Italy, France, England and Sweden (Bergman) received little comment from the buyers. Teitel said that he had had good luck with Japan's "Utamara" and "Odd Obsession," and Feulner said that he had done well with "Yojimbo." But otherwise they feel the "Made In ——" label only has boxoffice impact from the aforementioned countries. There has been some mild success with Russian films.

What the buyers want from the international producers is probably best summed up by Chuck Teitel: "I know these terms may sound corny and overworked, but ticket buyers for foreign pictures want provocative and adult themes, and I want to accentuate that I don't think sex is the only theme that comes under those categories. We have a potentially big audience, but it's not the kind of mass audience that television is looking for."

Not Just French Language In Canada

Influx of European Immigrants Boom Market For Lingual Features

By CHARLES LAZARUS

Montreal.

Leading exhibitors here in French-speaking Canada attribute the current boom in the foreign film business to the dramatic increase in the number of "new Canadians" from European countries, and the "liberal reawakening" on the part of the Provincial Government to a completely adult attitude in the application of film censorship.

When you add to the relatively "new Canadian" market the existing ready-made market in the French-Canadian population, it is easily understood why the "specialty" houses — not necessarily "art" theatres in the long-hair frame of reference—are doing so well.

The group of New Canadian ticket buyers, of course, is a plus to the French-Canadian patronage which, in recent years, with the raising of educational standards, has created a special brand of clients who select their product very carefully.

The buying power of this foreign element is reflected in the vastly increased number of films from France, Italy, German, Polish, Greek—in fact, name the country, and it's more than likely you'll find a representative film playing somewhere in the area.

George Destounis, executive vice-president of United Amusements Corp., which in recent years became part of the Famous Players family, pointed out in a recent interview that "Montreal is probably one of the outstanding cities on the continent, when it comes to providing a healthy outlet for foreign pictures. Business is booming, no question about that."

As a prime example of how business is booming, Destounis pointed to the Cinema Place Ville Marie, which opened soon after Place Ville Marie—a huge commercial-shopping-recreation complex in midtown Montreal—went into business early last fall.

"We did $260,000 in the first 25 weeks," he said, and even today, getting a seat on the weekend is a problem of finding the best place in the line.

Cinema Place Ville Marie opened with "Boccaccio '70" which ran SRO for months, and pointing up the solid appeal of the Italian picture, was the way it was played out:

Place Marie, which opened last September, consists of two theatres, a 650- and 150-seat respectively. The combo of a plush, new art theatre and a prime kickoff attraction like "Boccaccio," made it necessary to use both theatres to handle the overflow, the print being bicycled from one projection room to the other.

To understand what foreign films do best at the boxoffice, it is worth noting the William Lester, another United Amusements exec, points out that the French flicks, are a natural, whether they're of the average, grind nature or something special in terms of critical acclaim that would please the celebrating set.

Sex, as such, says Lester, "is neither a deterrent nor special attraction, probably because of the sophisticated nature of the audience, and the fact that there's enough non-libido product to go around."

Theatres like the Elysee and the recently converted Princess to the Parisien—the former house also has two projection rooms and two auditoriums, playing different pix—shuffle the kind of pictures they play, to bring in the more critical crowd, and the bread-and-butter buyers.

Greek and Polish films have also been enjoying a good play, in a theatre like the uptown Regent, where the population shift has brought in middle and lower middle class immigrants.

Mrs. Yvonne Taylor of Toronto, an experienced and successful hand in operating art houses in Toronto, is 50% owner of the Cinema Place Ville Marie.

Finally, there is the matter of the way the change in Quebec's censorship policies—for many years one of the worst scissor-happy areas in North America—has affected the overall foreign film market, and encouraged distributors to make Quebec a prime target for selling the offbeat and daring.

In fact, the easing of censorship and the change in policy by the Liberal Government is largely credited for making the first art film festival in 1966 the success that it was.

Like the first festival which played at the downtown Loew's for one solid week and with the most avant garde and experimental product, the succeeding festivals have been a smash both boxoffice-wise and critically.

The immediate and permanent effect was that the exhibs and distribs came to the conclusion that, with Quebec now working under one of the most progressive evaluation system possible in the field of censorship, audiences were ready to support the film houses playing foreign and adult-type films.

In Praise of Imports; Memphis Likes Films Differing From Video

By MATTY BRESCIA

Memphis.

Foreign films may become the salvation of the nabe and shopping center theatre owners. So thinks Bill Kendall, manager of the Guild and Studio theatres. Both houses are owned-operated by the Guild theatres of Cleveland, Ohio. They literally book solid with overseas product. Capacities are 466 and 400, respectively.

"It is the atmosphere of the small theatre, comfortable lobbies and frequent display of art attractions which help our business plenty," stated Kendall. He believes European product pleases precisely because it is not tailored to support U. S. taste.

Newly built Studio is within walking distance of Memphis State U. (enrollment 8,000) and attracts a healthy b.o. from this co-ed stand.

Kendall speaks of the unfettered independents who turn out offbeat pictures. "Why it only cost $160,000 to produce 'David and Lisa' which is just about the cost of Elizabeth Taylor's wardrobe in 'Cleopatra,'" he said.

He also pointed to Jules Dassin's Greek-made "Never on Sunday," which cost $150,000 to produce and has already grossed better than $2,000,000. This pic played his Studio house and racked up all records in a hold over—"And remember," Kendall remarked, "we didn't use any ads—just word of mouth around the neighborhood and school campus and it paid off plenty at our boxoffice."

Most of foreign pix unreeling at the Studio and Guild are bannered for "Adults Only." However, Kendall clearly stated: "Most foreign films are tasteful and adult in their approach. Yes, I'll admit some very candid, but nothing offensive. They are produced by foreign producers in a broader manner for the more cultured and educated element."

He commented that, best of all, his situations escaped competition with television.

Pittsburgh Showmen Credit Scripts; Stars Only Incidental to Imports

By LENNY LITMAN

Pittsburgh.

Foreign film producers should take a look at a picture like "Phaedra" and work from there. Here is a film with a star, good direction, good production and an excellent story. Everything that can be added to this established set of ingredients means dollars at American boxoffices.

In three separate interviews with the biggest exhibitors in the Pennsylvania, West Virginia and Ohio markets, this VARIETY correspondent learned that everything must start with a good story. Stars are important but the play's the thing. Stars like Alec Guiness, Peter Ustinov, Peter Sellers, Sophia Loren, Anita Ekberg, Terry-Thomas, Albert Finley have excellent marquee value and will sell the picture quicker. New names who mean something here are Romy Schneider and Robert Sordi, who was introduced to the United States in "Best of Enemies" which was helped by the presence of David Niven.

The three-Harry Feinstein, zone manager of Stanley Warner in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania and West Virginia; Ernie Stern, president of over 30 Associated Theatres in Pennsylvania and Ohio and Morris Finkel, president of Mt Oliver Theatre Corp—all agree that U. S. exhibitors are looking more and more to the foreign producers for product. They all say there is a definite shortage here and the use of films made in other countries are becoming a larger part of their exhibiting program.

Poor B.O. Vs. Prestige

Finkel, who runs the very successful art house, the Shadyside in Pittsburgh, said, "There is no profit in the true art picture except those made by Ingmar Bergman but they are necessary to the operation of an art house. We did poorly with "Ballad of a Soldier," "Island," "400 Blows" and "Hiroshima, Mon Amour" but will continue to play this type of picture as long as they receive such excellent critical acceptance."

Finkel urged producers to use themes dealing with mystery, comedy mystery, court room scenes and suspenseful drama. He also said he did not think color and size very important although they add a little to those destined for drive-in runs.

Finkel said that he did not think sex did much to help a picture and that the amount of sex in a picture was not an important issue here as long as it stayed within the bounds of good taste. He pointed out that the Catholic Legion of Decency or the church, itself avoided any issue on film sex because of the possibility the attention being brought to a picture would increase its gross and there isn't much anything can be done about it, anyway. He said that sex pictures find themselves mostly in nabe houses where they have built up a clientele like a burly house. He said he would have done three times the business on "Lovers" if it had been attacked as it was in other cities.

Finkel said that New York and Boston were no barometers of the amount of biz a film would do here and that he never really knew what a picture would do until it went on the screen.

Feinstein disagreed strongly with Finkel on this point. With the 56 theatres in his zone, he has found out that if a film does well in New York, it will do good here.

New York Is Different

"New York has an audience for everything," Feinstein said, "and a producer must release his picture there. A picture released in New York gets national attention from magazines and wire services and the demand is felt immediately in other cities. It is only the real way out films, which will do some business in New York, that we find of little value to us."

Feinstein commented that taste varies little around the country and a picture that does good in one city will generally do the same in another.

Feinstein is constntly looking at the foreign product. He said, "There is a definite shortage and we need product and are always looking for a film that will give us a week's business. Good foreign films that used to have a restricted market now get distribution everywhere. We especially like the English films and those with dubbed in sound so that no language barrier is presented. Sub titles are not nearly as satisfactory, except for the real art buff and titles usually limits appeal."

"Foreign film production is not different than domestic." Feinstein added. "We must give something they can't get for nothing. The standard of entertainment is higher today than it ever was. Picture must have quality and build through word of mouth. The public senses a bad picture."

Feinstein has already instituted a one day a week art film in all of his zone's houses. He claims that no town is too small for a one day a week showing and he has found that this policy is paying off for the chain.

Stern also agreed that a producer must start with a good story and keep adding and "everything you add gives you a better chance." He said, "Stars, production, color and size all mean more at the boxoffice. I follow New York and if a picture does well there, it will do good here at a lesser degree. Everyone of the big lav'sh spectacles from Italy and Japan do business in the drive-ins but I wouldn't play them downtown. Foreign films belong mostly in art houses, except those with American stars and a big Hollywood production.

10 Years of Art House Operation in Atlanta; British Easy Favorites

By SAM LUCHEESE

Atlanta.

Melvin Brown, of B & B Theatres Corp., owners and operators of 325-seat Pachtree Art Theatre, lays claim to being the first art house to do business as such south of Baltimore. He started in 1946, and started booking the import product available at the time, which was skimpy.

As Brown puts it, the first 10 years of the operation was "spade and missionary work." It has paid off.

Brown's best moneymakers by country string out about as follows:

(1) Great Britain (a) comedies, such as the "Carry on" series and (b) mysteries, which he considers superior to the domestic brand.

(2) France.

(3) Italy.

(4) Swedish (Bergman, et al, he says, is beyond the ken of his clientele).

(5) Germany (also, for the most part, a puzzlement to his patrons).

Brown hand picks his pictures and the ones that he personally considers "repulsive" or even distasteful never get to his screen. He does not like to play pictures with subtitles because some of his customers complain that they are "an annoyance."

He recalls that French pictures bore a stigma in Atlanta as being "immoral" at onetime, but now they enjoy great popularity. But showman concedes a portion of his audiences is on the "Sensation-seeking" fringe and read into what's going on on the screen something completely different from what the writer, director or producer may have had in mind.

Impact-By-Flags In U.S.A.

In the following reprise of foreign producing nations as their product played off in the domestic U.S.-Canada market in 1962, it must be stressed that the total rentals taken from theatres bears little relationship to the monies actually remitted from New York to the countries of origin. There remains the overhead charges, advertising costs and the other expenses of doing business in the U.S. It has become a truism of import deal-making that unrealistic advance payments handicap both sides. The international film has grown steadily in the States since the end of World War II, overcoming many resistances in the process. Today one hears very little of American objection to British "accent" on the sound track. British comedies are notably well liked by American audiences, especially in the urban, upper crust and collegiate environments.

Capsulated reports on the 1962 market data, as computed (and estimated) by this publication:

GREAT BRITAIN

The major companies continued to account for the lion's share ($[illegible],301,000) of total British film earnings ($24,027,434) in the U.S. last year. However, of the indies' share of $3,046,434, Walter Reade's Continental Distributing accounted for almost half, via such pix as "A Taste of Honey," "The Mark" and "Waltz of The Toreadors." Latter starred Peter Sellers, who also showed up (a number of times) in "Lolita". Carrying on the hit tradition of "Carry On, Nurse," was Governor Films' principal 1962 moneymaker, "Carry On, Teacher," which outgrossed both "Carry On, Sergeant" and "Carry On, Constable," which had followed "Nurse" into release this side. Generally speaking, however, it was not a big year for British-type humor. Notable disappointments of the year: the highly-praised "Whistle Down The Wind" and "Victim," both released by the now defunct Pathe-American and which together earned only $[illegible].

ITALY

Total earnings in U.S. last year declined to $8,884,862 from $11,140,570 in 1961, largely as a result of the lack of any new blockbusters being in release for the major part of the year. Expectations for 1963 are considerably brighter, however, when the results of "Divorce, Italian-Style," "Sodom and Gomorrah" and the Fellini's soon-to-be-released "8-1/2" will show up on the balance sheets. Earnings of language product, shown without subtitles in houses catering to Italian-speaking audiences, were down to approximately $72,000 from an estimated $110,000 in 1961. Reflecting Joe Levine's close ties with Italy, as well as the previously mentioned decline in Italo exploitation pix, usually handled by the majors, total Italo film earnings in the U.S. are almost evenly divided between the majors and the indies.

FRANCE

Largely as a result of the results on "Sky Above—Mud Below," French pix scored the most impressive increase in U.S. earnings last year, up to $6,404,130 from $3,060,000 in 1961. Another hefty money-maker was Continental Distributing's "View from The Bridge," the made-in-France (locations shot in Brooklyn) film adaptation of Arthur Miller's play. It earned close to $1,000,000. Also a hit was Continental's "La Belle Americaine." Other sizable earners were Magna's "Black Tights" (though still an overall disappointment), Audubon's "I Spit on Your Grave" (a hot exploitation item), as well as two Bardot items, the playoff of 1961's "The Truth" and first release of "A Very Private Affair." Together the last two accounted for an estimated $[illegible] in rentals, good by any standards other than Bardot's own previous record in the U.S. market. (The two pix also carried expensive budgets.) A flop in terms of distributor's investment was "Les Liaisons Dangereuses," but "Last Year in Marienbad," about as esoteric as you can get, was in the black with earnings of approximately $175,000. The French also had a lot of prestige going for them in 1962, with, among other pix, the critically acclaimed "Tomorrow Is My Turn" (Passage du Rhin), plus the Oscar-winning "Sundays and Cybele." Results of the latter, which went out at 1962 yearend, will not show on rental totals until next year.

MEXICO

The slight decline, to $3,226,000 in 1962 from $3,427,000 in 1961, does not reflect a dip in the Spanish language market in the States; rather it reflects an effort to differentiate in this year's survey among the language product originating in Mexico, Spain and Argentina. In previous year's surveys, Mexico has been credited with the blanket total, because Azteca and Columbia, which service the State-side Spanish houses, deal principally in Mex pix. Actual Mex earnings north of the border are estimated to be up.

JAPAN

Of the total of $1,694,011 earned by 176 Japanese films in the U.S. in 1962, an estimated $1,[illegible] was earned by 1[illegible] pix shown in houses catering to Japanese-speaking audiences principally in Hawaii and on the U.S. west coast. However, there were also some respectable earners handled by U.S. distribs, including the sci-fi feature, "Mothra," which accounted for about $[illegible], and such artie items as "The Important Man," "Yojimbo," etc. Expected to have a beneficial effect on creating greater U.S. artie acceptance of Japanese films was the opening in New York, at yearend, of Toho's own Toho Cinema as a Broadway showcase.

DENMARK

Denmark's fantastic upbeat in U.S. rentals last year—to $1,110,000 from $130,000 in 1961—is just that: fantastic. Something over $1,000,000 was earned by three sci-fi items handled by American International Pictures.

W. GERMANY

Biggest single money earner last year was Paramount's "Forever My Love," a dubbed-in-English historical romance starring Romy Schneider. Pic, backed by Par's big distrib organization, got close to half a million dollars in rentals. Rest of the German total of $1,000,000, was earned by German language product for German houses (about $[illegible]) and a batch of exploitation items. With the exception of Allied Artists' continuing playoff of "The Bridge," art entries were scarce.

SPAIN

About half of Spain's $804,000 was brought in by 10 pix seen in the Spanish language houses. Another $[illegible] was earned by a Spanish-Italo coproduction spectacle, listed here as of Spanish nationality.

GREECE

Down sharply in 1962 to $895,365 from the "Never On Sunday"-swollen 1961 total of $3,112,000. Of the 1962 figure, approximately $700,000 reps further dates on "Sunday," plus first release of "Phaedra" and "Electra." Pix aimed at Greek language houses accounted for 90% of the rest.

SWEDEN

Also down sharply in 1962, to $510,500 from $2,104,300 in 1961. The 1961 figure included $1,[illegible] in rentals on the "Mein Kampf" exploitation pic. Ingmar Bergman continues to draw, accounting for an estimated $[illegible] of the total Swedish earnings last year. His Oscar winners, "Virgin Spring" (1961) and "Through A Glass Darkly" (1962), doing most of the work.

SOVIET RUSSIA

Of the 1962 total of $304,000, almost half was earned by two pix, "A Summer To Remember" and the playoff of 1961's "Ballad of A Soldier." Most of the rest earned by Artkino. No significant monies were taken in by the leftover cultural exchange pix which bolstered Russ earnings briefly in 1960.

ARGENTINA

A healthy increase in rentals last year to $113,000, from $32,000 in 1961, and all but $33,000 earned by seven pix distributed to Spanish language houses. Two Leopoldo Torre-Nilsson pix accounted for that $33,000.

INDIA

Four pix done by Satyajit Ray earned all of India's earnings here last year.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Playoff on a puppet film and a film of animated drawings pushed Czech earnings up to $36,000 in 1962 from $30,000 the year before.

POLAND

Still has yet to really crack the U.S. market, despite the critical success of such releases as "Kanal," "Ashes and Diamonds" and "Joan of The Angels", which was last year's only significant new Polish import.

Imports on Seesaw

the International Film Edition last year, the 1961 totals were "swollen" abnormally by the huge earnings on such "British" pix as Columbia's "Guns of Navarone," Buena Vista's "Swiss Family Robinson" and Paramount's "World of Suzie Wong," which together accounted for rentals of $24,[illegible].

There were no such comparable "British" blockbusters in 1962. Indeed, only four made-in-Britain major company releases earned $1,000,000 or more: Metro's "Lolita" ($4,300,000); United Artists' "Road to Hong Kong" ($[illegible]); Warners' "Roman Spring of Mrs. Stone" ($1,400,000) and 20th-Fox's "The Innocents" ($1,[illegible]). (The U.S. majors did have their blockbusters last year, but all were either made in the States, or as completely U.S. productions lensed abroad.)

While only a handful of individual imports in 1962 exceeded $1,000,000 in U.S. rentals, or even approached that golden mark, there were about 14 more which brought in receipts in excess of $[illegible], an extremely healthy return for the more esoteric imports if acquired at the right price.

Because the vast majority of imports fit either into the erotica (exploitation) or esoterica (art) category (but seldom into both, with any ease), it's easy to understand why the Joe Levine's French import, "The Sky Above—The Mud Below," wound up as the year's most successful ($1,100,000) language feature (dubbed, of course, with English narration). The beautifully photographed, comparatively highbrow traveler played both sides of the street ("See white men forced into intimacies with their native hosts!" was one of the approaches). It also played a key part in the big upbeat in U.S. rentals on French pix in 1962—$6,404,130, compared with $3,060,000 in 1961.

Levine product-and-promotion also accounted for almost one-third of the $8,884,862 total earned in the States last year by Italo pix, the biggest earner being "Two Women," which went out in 1961 but, hypoed by Sophia Loren's Oscar in April of last year, went on to account for another million or so in 1962. The former Boston showman also parlayed another Loren film, "Boccaccio '70" into hefty grosses, despite a Legion of Decency condemnation and only so-so reviews.

The U.S. market for Italo spectacles now appears to be levelling off but holding firm. After 1960, when 15 specs earned a whopping $8,[illegible],113 (almost as much as all Italo pix earned here last year), the total for 15 spear-and-sandal epics in 1961 dropped sharply to $4,[illegible],000. Last year, however, the decline slowed up, with 13 pix accounting for $3,[illegible].

A country-by-country analysis of foreign film rentals in the U.S. in 1962 is presented herewith. It should also be emphasized that the figures quoted represent distributors' share of rentals.

'Major' Vs 'Indie' Distribs Share of Foreign U.S. Dates

The following table breaks down the share of foreign film rentals earned in the U.S. in 1962 between the major companies and independent distributors. Number of films shown in parentheses.

COUNTRY OF ORIGIN	MAJORS' SHARE OF ESTIMATED RENTALS		INDIES SHARE OF ESTIMATED RENTALS
Britain	$[illegible],301,000	(22)	$ 3,046,434	(100)
Italy	4,[illegible]	(14)	4,[illegible]	(70)
France	[illegible]	(2)	3,700,[illegible]	([illegible])
Mexico	[illegible]	([illegible])	2,[illegible]	([illegible])
Japan	[illegible]	(1)	1,694,011	(175)
Denmark	1,100,000	(3)	10,000	(2)
Germany	[illegible]	(3)	400,000	([illegible])
Spain	700,000	(13)	204,000	(11)
Greece	none		895,365	(30)
Sweden	none		510,000	(17)
Russia	none		304,000	([illegible])
Argentina	none		113,000	(9)
India	none		75,000	(4)
Czechoslovakia	20,000	(1)	30,000	(1)
Poland	none		17,000	(4)
TOTALS	$27,341,000	(70)	$22,[illegible],301	(761)

While, in terms of dollars, the indies' 1962 share of $22,[illegible],301 was off slightly from the comparable 1961 figure ($22,[illegible],048), they leaped ahead percentage-wise. This was a reflection of the sharp decline in earnings registered by the majors on their made-in-Britain pix, down to $18,301,000 from $34,300,000 in 1961. It should be pointed out, however, that the majors' 1961 figure was abnormally big because of the huge earnings on "Guns of Navarone," "Swiss Family Robinson" and "World of Suzie Wong," three blockbusters who together accounted for rentals of $24,[illegible]. The biggest made-in-Britain moneyearner in 1962 was Metro's "Lolita," which brought in $4,300,000. Nothing else came close to that total.

For the purposes of this survey, Lopert Films, a subsidiary of United Artists, and Kingsley Union, which functioned as Columbia's U.S. artie distrib, are considered to be independent distributors.

EVEN TINY TOWNS GET 'FOREIGN' PIX

By LENNY LITMAN

Pittsburgh.

Harry Feinstein, zone manager for Stanley-Warner in Western Pennsylvania, West Virginia and Ohio, declared that he is introducing art films into all the small houses in the circuit. He reported great success in cities like Lima, Ohio, and will soon be shown in towns like Punxsutawney, Pa., with a population of only 9,000.

Feinstein said that this expanding market should be considered by foreign film producers and that the art film will soon be seen in every town and hamlet in the country.

"Each town, no matter its size," said Feinstein, "has a population of professional people, teachers and others of highly developed taste who may not want the ordinary run of film fare but will come out for the art picture."

"We dress it up a little and have one show at 8.30 and where we formerly got something like $75 on the night we now see grosses of over $300."

"Big cities have already played the good foreign films that were made in England or the dubbed in version of pictures like "Boccaccio '70" and "Divorce, Italian Style" but now we are showing Ingmar Bergman in Lima and plan to show his pictures all over, including Punxsutawney."

Non-Alike Twin Cities; St. Paul Resists Le Sexy

By ROBERT REES

Minneapolis.

In the Twin Cities (Minneapolis-St. Paul) with more than 1,[illegible] practically all British pictures imported to the U. S. get a playoff. In Minneapolis, with its large Scandinavian population, very few of the better foreign pictures reaching this country are overlooked for exhibition. But across the Mississippi River in St. Paul, with more than [illegible] residents and an influential Catholic clergy, the British comedies and some of the serious films from the British Isles alone are "welcome."

Bob Hazelton and Martin Field agree that for both British product, especially the comedies with Peter Sellers, Terry-Thomas and Alec Guinness represent far and away the best boxoffice weight among imported films.

Hazelton is general manager of the Ted Mann circuit which, in Minneapolis alone, has five theatres playing foreign films—four of these houses are neighborhood art stands which present them regularly. Field serves in a similar capacity for the Harold Field chain which has two Minneapolis theatres offering foreign films occasionally—the first-run Park and the subsequent-run Uptown.

In St. Paul even "Never on Sunday" (UA), a smash boxoffice hit in various Minneapolis situations, has never been shown. The Midtown neighborhood theatre there tried to operate as an art house with foreign pictures, but finally forgot it.

Hazelton points out that the Swenskas here respond fairly well to the Ingmar Bergman releases from Sweden. But the Italian and French sexsationals are a dubious commodity, seldom predictable. When it is necessary to fly the "adults only" banner, that crimps biz with kids and teeners, a reliable segment of trade. Subtitled imports encounter their own resistances.

"Many people certainly are disturbed in this area by the subject matter of the adult films, especially the foreign releases, now being presented on our screens," says Field. "However as a rule we find the person complaining about one of our movie's content is thinking not what he or she themselves would like to see, but what they think others should see."

Field also makes the point that a non-British film with a star like Sophia Loren can display boxoffice pull in Minneapolis.

Britain, Italy, France Tops In U.S.

The following chart is a country-by-country breakdown on the estimated U.S.-Canadian rentals earned by product originating from abroad in 1962, with comparable figures for 1961 shown in the parentheses. The totals include rentals on those features either wholly or partially financed by Americans and which are either in a foreign language and or qualify as "local productions under the laws of the countries in which they were made.

MAGIC NO MORE, SKILLS PREVAIL

By ROBERT F. HAWKINS

Rome.

Crisis or no crisis?—that seems to be the main question currently debated in the Italian film industry.

The failure of several companies in recent months, the even more recent production slowdown of one of this country's main filmaking companies, Titanus, have inevitably brought things to a head and accented a situation which has been known but not openly discussed for some time.

Inevitably too, these rumors and reports have brought understandable denials of trouble from those directly involved and, at the same time, stimulated exaggeratedly pessimistic predictions by press and other sources over the local motion picture future.

The situation is indeed a serious one, and more heads may roll before it ends. But few informed observers here feel it is—at this time—a critical one, one which would spell the end of an unprecedented Italian cinema boom which has lasted several years and firmly established Rome as one of the film capitals of the world.

For the present, troubles are, if analyzed, primarily financial. The Italian Banks and other sources of film credit have shut up tight, cutting off almost all sources of film subsidy. It will be a while before they regain confidence in the film medium. Until then, only those companies with a sound financial status of their own and or access to foreign guarantees, will be able to proceed.

Fortunately for the local industry, there are still several of these.

Big Promise Items

Also, and perhaps more importantly, there is no dearth of ideas among Italo film shapers. Interesting projects abound. Top directors and writers are busy on current or future projects. "Divorce, Italian Style", "La Dolce Vita" and other well-traveled releases have already been followed by Fellini's new "8-1 2" and Luchino Visconti's "The Leopard". Pietro Germi plans to start his follow-up to "Divorce" this summer. Dino DeLaurentiis is preparing "Sacco and Vanzetti" and many more pix of international scope as well as, of course, his "The Bible".

Italian production costs have skyrocketed. Some blame visiting Yank showmen. Others blame Italy's own overproduction and the resultant shortage of competent manpower. Suffice that costs must come down.

Whether it be 200, 250, or 270, the fact remains that too many films—especially too many unprofitable items—were made during 1962; the discrepancy in totals is the result of totting up all films, including coproductions, which eventually qualify as Italian, or only all films made in this country, of all films started during the twelve months, etc.

Over-optimistic as to the new maturity of film audiences, producers went overboard on arty items from youngsters just breaking into films (though several such films were commercially as well as critically successful). Too costly spectacles did not find the easy market of some years back.

Over-Estimated

The United States market has likewise been generally over-estimated as a surefire market for certain films. The success of certain key Italo features in the U.S., plus the high prices paid (and then regretted) by some U.S. firms have contributed to this Roman euphoria, which in turn has helped up prices and totals.

Wiser now, companies have turned to low- or medium-budgeted "local" comedies for insurance. Many of these are spoofs of current releases ("The Shortest Day", "Toto and Cleopatra", etc.) Others, especially those made with such names as Alberto Sordi and Ugo Tognazzi, are cut several notches over this norm and have a certain foreign potential.

Rome Crowded With Internationalists; Many Own Homes, Make Many Films

Rome.

The Italian production boom has consequentially drawn the usual large number of foreign stars to Rome. Apart from the various trends (the spectacle vein which has brought in a large contingent of muscle men) and the coproductions with France and other countries which have made it profitable for quota-filling foreign stars to reside here, Rome has long been the home-away-from-home for many citizens of Hollywood and other film capitals.

Thus Anita Ekberg, long a busy local resident; and Robert Wagner, who rents a Rome apartment as a European headquarters; or Mark Damon, whose eight European films in the past 18 months must surely be a record of sorts for the Golden Globe winner; or the ubiquitous Orson Welles, who owns a home in seaside Fregene; or Steve Reeves, who as "Hercules" became the symbol of a trend which still lasts; or Channing Pollock, who turned in his magics cape to begin acting in films—and stayed to open a Roman gift shop as well; and many many others who are more or less permanent Rome scene fixtures.

More recently, Rod Steiger came in for an Italian film, "Hands Upon the City," plans another, has taken a flat and been joined by his wife, Claire Bloom and family. The entire "Cleopatra" contingent, from Elizabeth Taylor, Richard Burton, Rex Harrison (who owns an Italian Riviera villa) to the remainder of the huge rosters of stars and technicians certainly helped inflate the lists of visiting vips.

Certainly Frank Wolff deserves special mention for an unusual facet of his burgeoning career here: after jelling a local reputation playing a Sicilian bandit in Francesco Rosi's "Salvatore Giuliano," this American actor has gone on to a key cameo—again playing an Italian—in Italy's Oscar contender, "Four Days of Naples," and has since played no less than Count Ciano, Mussolini's son-in-law, in "Verona Trial" as well as a starring role in "The Demons."

Without regard to order of time and or importance, here are some of the other film names linked with Rome in recent months.

Fredric March, Maximilian Schell, Francoise Prevost, Burt Lancaster, Cyd Charisse, Hugh O'Brian, John Gavin, George Sanders, Shirley Jones, Jose Ferrer, Reginald Kernan, Anthony Steel, Walter Pidgeon, Dahlia Lavi, Edward G. Robinson, Kirk Douglas, Arthur Kennedy, Hardy Kruger, Peter Sellers, David Niven, Ben Gazzara, Gordon Scott, Fernando Lamas, Esther Williams, Edmond Purdom, Linda Christian, Lex Barker, Brett Halsey, Barbara Steele, Howard Duff, Curt Lowens, Stewart Granger, Jacques Bergerac, Eddie Bracken, Jackie Lane, Richard Harrison, Sean Flynn, John Erickson, James Mason, Lilli Palmer, Tania Lopert, Joe Robinson, Ingrid Thulin, Brad Harris, Stephen Boyd, Norma Benguel, Akim Tamiroff, Jayne Mansfield, Eleanor Parker, Mike Connors, Claude Rains, Hava Harareet, George Nader, Vincent Price, Boris Karloff, Gordon Mitchell, Don Burnett, Jennings Lang, Martin Balsam, David Opatoshu, Stanley Baker, plus such German names as Ruth Leuwerick, Gerd Froebe, Peter Carstens, Bernard Wicki, Hildegarde Neff, O. W. Fischer, Walter Giller, Nadia Tiller, Romy Schneider, Mario Adorf, Marianne Hold, and many others.

In the French group are (to name a few) Emanuele Riva, Brigitte Bardot, Philipe LeRoy, Maurice Chevalier, Mylene Demongeot, Charles Aznavour, J. P. Belmondo, Fernandel, Jean Sorel, Alain Delon, Pascale Petit, Micheline Presle, Michele Morgan, Annie Girardot, Michel Piccoli, Gerard Blain, Paul Guers, Alexandra Stewart, Pierre Mondy, Michele Mercier, Madeleine Lebeau, Anouk Aimee, Magali Noel, Jacques Perrin, Jean Louis Trintignant, Georges Wilson, Beatrice Altariba, Bourvil, Pierre Brice, Helene Chanel, George Marchal, and Catherine Spaak who has during the past year become the symbol of the Italian teenager — though a foreigner — just as Marina Vlady (also still busy here) shaped her film career in Italy, only later going on to success in her native France.

And there have been many visiting directors as well, several of them imported from the US for local pix, such as George Marshall, Gerd Oswald, Hugo Fregonese, Andre de Toth, Rudy Mate, Joseph Losey, Joseph Anthony and others.

Prize-Prone And Proud: That's Italy

Rome.

The Italian Film Industry is proud of its continued success on the international film scene, as demonstrated by the prestige accrued at 1962 festival as well as by the monetary revenue — and flattering comments — garnered during the past 12 months by the exported Italo pic, spearheaded by such items as "Divorce, Italian Style," "Boccaccio," "Eclipse," "Salvatore Giuliano," and many others.

Indications are that a repeat performance is planned for 1963 as well. Italy has strong contenders once more in the prestige and or boxoffice class, beginning with Federico Fellini's "8½" and Luchino Visconti's "The Leopard," and ending with Pietro Germi's currently-prepping new item, "Seduced and Abandoned," Renato Castellani's "Crazy Sea," the new Claudia Cardinale starrer, "Rube's Girl," and many others.

But to get back to 1962, the list is indeed an impressive one. At Mar Del Plata, Elio Petri's "The Numbered Days" won an undisputed Grand Prix, the Gaucho de Oro, for its producers, Titanus-Metro.

At Cannes, Pietro Germi's Vides Production of "Divorce, Italian Style" won the first of its many kudos as best comedy of the Festival, while Michelangelo Antonioni's "Eclipse" won a distinguished second prize. Soon after, at Berlin, Francesco Rosi was tabbed best director for his stint on "Salvatore Giuliano," which won the Silver Bear at the German event.

Another Grand Prix, the Concha de Oro, rewarded Italy's entry at San Sebastian, "Arturo's Island," directed for Titanus-Metro by Damiano Damiani. The best direction prize at the same event went to Mauro Bolognini for "Senilita" (Indias), in which Anthony Franciosa appeared opposite Claudia Cardinale. At the Czech spa of Karlovy Vary, Pier Paolo Pasolini took a second prize for his "Accattone" (Arco).

Locarno's Silver Sail award subsequently went to Luigi Zampa for his work on "Anni Ruggenti," while Italy also copped the best documentary award at the Swiss event.

Venice followed, and again a Titanus-Metro production, "Family Chronicle," directed by Valerio Zurlini, came out on top, sharing the Gold Lion Grand Prize with Russia's "Childhood of Ivan." Also at the lagoon event, two first feature efforts, Eriprando Visconti's "Milanese Story" and Orsini and Taviani's "A Man for Burning," won special mentions.

Mar Del Plata 1963 Dino Risi sets the ball rolling again with the first Italian win of the year, as best director for his "Il Sorpasso" (Fairfilm).

Last but not least by local estimations is the recent Oscar prize for best screenplay, which went to Pietro Germi, Alfredo Giannetti, and Ennio de Concini for their work on "Divorce, Italian Style," the first time Italian citizens have won in this specialized category.

Taxation, Television And Finances Haunting Italy

By EITEL MONACO

President, A.N.I.C.A. (Italian Film Industry Association)

Rome.

Italy's film industry at the present time is endeavoring to solve three problems, all of them equally interesting. These are, respectively.

1) Abolition of taxes on tickets of admission

2) Relations to television

3) A new plan for self-financing of production within a frame of more extensive agreements among all the film industries of countries belonging to the European Economic Community

The heavy levy which the exceptional taxes now in force in Italy make on the earnings of film theatres, is well known, but it is still worth remembering. Last year, on a total earning of 122 billion lire (about $220 million), taxes on tickets have brought the State a revenue of over $50 million. As such taxes are applied to tickets according to a progressive percentage of their prices, and as these prices are slowly and steadily going up, the weight of this heavy taxation is also increasing, thus reducing in a most drastic way the net earnings of exhibitors, distributors and producers.

The two industrial organizations of the Italian film industry — ANICA for producers and distributors, and AGIS for exhibitors have been for some time engaged in an energetic action which aims at obtaining from the new Parliament the complete abolition of the exceptional taxes now levied on box-office earnings. This could re-establish a situation of equilibrium in the field of international competition as regards film industries of those countries, such as the United States, Great Britain, Germany and others where the nearly complete abolition of taxes is already a reality.

Such abolition would also end the unfair situation existing in our country in the matter of taxation, and which is all in favour of television and against our film industry. The number of television sets in Italy now exceeds 13,500,000, and—which is even worse—60,000 of them are installed in places open to the public, such as hotels, restaurants, clubs or entertainment halls, which are very often transformed into real television theatres, and which are completely free from taxation.

Deadly B.O. Rival

All this makes it urgent and essential for us to tackle also the second problem: the problem, that is, concerning relations between cinema and television, which have gradually become more and more difficult since the Italian television network has started to broadcast more (and better) feature films. Unfortunately some American film companies have recently sold to RAI-TV about 200 feature films at ridiculously low prices, and some of these films, although produced some time ago, still hold a remarkable artistic and commercial value; their showing on television screens here has proved a great negative influence on our cinema business.

To demonstrate against taxes on admissions and against competition by television, Rome's film exhibitors, a few weeks ago, closed their theatres for a whole day. It is foreseen that similar actions will be taken also in other Italian cities. Indeed, this demonstration, for which exhibitors had the full support of producers and distributors, has already obtained a first result: the Television service, which is here exclusively controlled by the State, has undertaken to show only one film a week for each of the two channels, and this never on holidays nor on the days immediately before holidays.

But this is not enough: we must obtain that the massive buying of foreign or national films by television be stopped, we must assure to exhibitors the priority rights on pictures which may be subject to a further exploitation by cinema theatres; we must obtain that television films, films that is, which are meant for television showings, be really and thoroughly different from the pictures which are normally shown in cinema theatres.

These two difficult problems, abolition of taxes and better discipline in the relations between cinema and television, are presently the object of a very intense activity of the international organizations. The Bureau International du Cinema—B.I.C.—in particular, has constantly included these two items in the Agenda of its works, and since its inception. It is well known that B.I.C. acts as co-ordinator of the activities of all the international federations existing in the field of films: I.F.P.A. for producers, F.I.A.D. for distributors, U.I.E.C. for exhibitors and C.I.T.C. for technical industries.

In the course of the General Assembly of B.I.C., held in Milan in April 1962, it was decided to endorse a very definite attitude to adopt towards these two problems, and to draw the lines of a really strong action to be taken in the next months. We trust that Motion Picture Export Assn. on behalf of the whole American film industry, will play an effective part in the action undertaken for the solution of these problems essential to the survival of the European film industry; which they can do simply by avoiding that the lamented inconveniences caused by the massive sale of films to the Italian television, should happen again. We sincerely hope that the American film industry, and M.P.E.A. will be ready to show their solidarity with the European organizations and industries, not by adopting a hostile attitude towards this new, powerful means of diffusion; not by hindering its programs; but only helping to avoid the building up between cinema and television of a seriously discriminating situation in the very field of film showing.

Self-Financing

As for the third problem, concerning relations between the State and the film industry, the Italian industry has started on a wide action which, in the frame of more extensive agreements among all the countries which are members of the European Economic Community, aims at obtaining substantial modifications in the legislations now in force.

As soon as the abolition of the exceptional taxes on box-office earnings will establish an equal situation in the matter of taxation with regard to films and any other industry or service, the Italian film industry is ready to give up every aid and contribution by the State.

On the other hand, as it is unanimously recognized that the greatest risks and the greatest economic difficulties are those met with by film producers, a draft agreement has already been reached with the Exhibitors' Association, for the realization of an organic plan for the self-financing of the production.

This plan is based on principles which are very simple and inspired by the most absolute equity. A share of the earnings of all film performances, free from every burden of heavy taxation, shall be destined to the financing of production. The amount of such share —which would vary from five to ten percent of the net earnings— will be decided upon by the various branches concerned, and made obligatory by a special provision of law.

Each country shall chose the most suitable way of distributing the revenues of the self-financing Fund. Absolute priority, however, will be granted to the automatic integration of the earnings accruing to each national film from the normal commercial exploitation of the same film; and also to the reduction of interest paid on loans in favour of production. All the advantages thus granted to the producers of national films, will automatically also benefit films recognized as national by the other C.E.E. countries, when similar provisions will be adopted in these countries. Our final purpose is to obtain, on a strict basis of reciprocity, that every film produced within the Common Market area, may receive in all member countries of the Community the same treatment and the same benefits. Even those countries which are not included in the European Economic Community could adopt a similar policy: a good example of this kind has recently come from Sweden, where a law inspired by the above said principles, is now being discussed.

Nor should the American film industry be afraid that dangers or hindrances may derive to it from the realization of these plans. First, because the amount of shares accruing to the financing of national production will be in any case inferior to the amount of those taxes which we want to abolish. Second, because also the American companies will be able to benefit, through appropriate co-production or joint-production agreements, from the advantages of this self-financing scheme. And finally because in the present, seriously defective situation of the world film industry, any initiative aiming both at the revival and at a fair organic development of the industry, is bound to give a valuable contribution to the actual survival of the film industry itself.

Every film industry, in every corner of the free world, must share this same, precise interest: an immediate strengthening of all their defenses against the more and more dangerous competition of the latests ways of employing free time, and above all against the continuous spread and the continuous technical progress of television.

ROME WAGE ESTIMATES

Rome.

Points of resemblance between the film industry of Italy and that of United States are numerous but one significant difference lies in the comparatively impossible-to-confirm facts of individual Italian talent compensation. So rare is salary insight in the Rome film colony that it was big word-of-mouth locally when a tradepaper here, "Rome Presents" threw light on paycheck averages. The data which follows is reprinted here to fill a gap by express permission of "Rome Presents."

Categories marked with an asterisk indicate that the compensation is not union-controlled.

'Leopard' Leads Italo Pic Parade to Cannes

Rome.

Italy will be represented at the Cannes Film Festival by four features, three of them in competition.

"The Leopard", Titanus Film production starring Burt Lancaster, is officially designated entry. Pic, based on the Prince Tommasi di Lampedusa novel, was directed by Luchino Visconti and is currently big boxoffice throughout Italy.

Two other films have been officially invited by Cannes. They are "Una Storia Moderna: L'Ape Regina" (Queen Bee) produced by Lenauro Films with Marco Ferreri directing Ugo Tognazzi and Marina Vlady; and "I Fidanzati" (The Fiancees), directed for Titanus Films by Ermanno Olmi with a cast of unknowns.

Fourth Italo item to be seen along the Croisette is Federico Fellini's "8-1/2" (Cineriz), which will wind up the Riviera event with a non-competitive showing.

Interesting footnote: Yank companies hold non-Italian release rights to three of the four above pix. Embassy Pictures has both "8-1/2" and "Queen Bee", while 20th has "The Leopard".

Educated Guesses On Top Talents' Salary Range

Newsreel Systems Round World

TV (Home) Big New Influence

By SANDRO PALLAVICINI

Rome.

It might be thought that, with the increasing spread of television, and the correlative rise in the numbers viewing television newsreels, theatre newsreels would gradually lose their appeal. But the most authoritative international organizations, specialized in polls, affirm just the contrary.

The television newsreel, with its numerous daily editions, "infiltrates" news items, presenting them one after the other in such a cold way that they end up by assuming the same value, that is, a mediocre value, in the eyes of the viewer.

This peculiar technique, which television must necessarily adopt owing to time and program requirements, leads to a levelling process and the parallel decline of the interest of the public. A News item appearing in the television newsreel, even if it is given particular stress, is practically wiped out by the other innumerable and similar news items, broadcasted on the same day or even in the same newsreel. The result of all this is complete "annihilation" of all the images from the viewer's memory.

Nevertheless, the television newsreel unquestionably offers the advantage of immediate viewing, accessible to all social levels, like the daily newspaper. The cinema newsreel, on the contrary, especially in its present evolution, which will be even more marked in the near future, is equivalent to a popular illustrated magazine in celluloid, that is, it provides a selection of the most important events of the week, and not of the day, and a critical interpretation of their contents, which often constitute the theme of a journalistic survey.

On the other hand, it is necessary to take into consideration the different psychological and environmental conditions in which the two productions are viewed. The television newsreel penetrates into the home, attracting the interest, which is often discontinuous or superficial, of a family group; the cinema newsreel, on the contrary, is addressed to a public of cinema goers, where concentration of interest is normal, while the collective reactions themselves represent a further incentive to participation by the spectators.

The Private Newsreel

The common viewer knows that the television newsreel, even if it is compared with objectivity, is a State product in many countries, and he also knows that the events presented are subjected to the judgment of a superintending committee, a judgment which is nearly always impersonal or conformist. The spectator's mental attitude towards a cinema newsreel produced by private enterprise is quite different. Any political event presented by a cinema newsreel penetrates in the spectator the conviction that it is the most important event of the week. The very fact that it has been chosen by private newsreel production constitutes the proof of its intrinsic value, that is, of its interest quite apart from State considerations. In other words, the force of penetration of the cinema newsreel is not only immensely greater than that of the television newsreel, but has far more lasting effects in spite of the very different numerical proportion of their respective publics.

In Italy, the cinema records an annual attendance of a public of about eight hundred million, and this means that, every day, over two million persons enter the cinemas. This heterogeneous public is now accustomed to seeing, together with the film, a cinema newsreel in which events, even if there is a time lag in comparison with the television newsreel, are presented in a completely different version. The same viewer who has followed an official ceremony on the television screen, finds a different perspective and greater power of expression when he sees it again on the large cinema screen.

National Policies

Information detailed below is extracted from a research of Sandro Pallavicini of Rome, Italy, where he is (1) President of the Centro Cinematografico e Televisivo (2) President of the Unione Nazionale Produttori Cortometraggi-ANICA and (3) President of the International Newsreel Assn. Except where parenthetically noted as a greater or lesser number all newsreels are issued 52 times annually.

This further fact ought to be borne in mind: state-owned newsreels are part of a government educational and/or propaganda policy. Typically, state-owned newsreels are obligatory playoff for all theatres.

Absent from the Pallavicini compilation is the United States where because of double features and TV, newsreels have fallen upon hard times, though they thrived during the war years.

Foreign newsreels tend to range in length from 180 to 300 meters per issue.

Trade Voices in Italy

Rome.

Officially, the film industry comes under the Ministry of Tourism & Entertainment, headed by a Minister and two Under-Secretaries directly answerable to him. In turn, the "Direzione delle Spettacolo," long headed by the recently retired Nicola de Pirro, is responsible for all entertainment matters in the two Under-Secretaries. Apart from film matters, "Direzione delle Spettacolo" also is charged with general supervision, in Italy's state— subsidized industry setup, of such various pic activities as production, import, and export, etc. as well as many other subsidized and semi-subsidized sectors of the Italo film industry picture. Herewith other film trade associations and authorities:

Associazione Nazionale Industrie Cinematografiche ed Affini (ANICA)—Overall industry association charged with supervision and negotiation of industry problems—with sole exception of exhib sector—both nationally and internationally. President: Ettel Monaco.

Unione Nazionale Distributori Film (UNIDF)—National film distributors union, part of ANICA, handling national release problems of member companies, which include Yank outlets in Italy. President: Franco Peretti.

Unione Nazionale Produttori Film (UNPF)—National producers association under ANICA, deals exclusively with problems pertaining to production sector. President: Goffredo Lombardo.

Unione Nazionale Produttori Cortometraggi (UNPC)—Grouping under ANICA of Italian producers of newsreels, documentaries, and TV-Films. President: Sandro Pallavicini.

Unione Nazionale Industrie Tecniche Cinematografiche (UNITC)—Group heading all technical sectors on local industry, divided into separate organizations, including film studios, labs, dubbing studios, and auxiliary equipment concerns. Part of ANICA. President: Alberto Grassi.

Unione Nazionale Cinematografia Specializzata (UNCS) — ANICA subdivision including groups covering fields of 16mm production, Educational and Didactic Films, Industrial Films, and Animated Films. President: Giuseppe Taverna.

Associazione Generale Italiana dello Spettacolo (AGIS)—Overall exhib association covering and dealing with all problems in sector on national and international level. Besides all pic theatres, AGIS also covers legit, taxi shows, and other types of theatres.

Associazione Nazionale Esercenti Cinematografici (ANEC)—National pic exhibitors association under AGIS, handling labor and other problems of sector.

Associazione Cattolica Esercenti Cinematografici (ACEC) — Group running Catholic parochial houses on commercial basis.

Associazione Direttori Cinematografici (ADC)—Male Film Producers and production managers dealing for sector in labor and union problems mainly.

Associazione Italiana Cineoperatori (AIC)—Film Cameramen with labor and union functions.

Associazione Nazionale Autori Cinematografici (ANAC)—Grouping film "authors": directors, writers, on various problems concerning sector.

Centro Cattolico Cinematografico (CCC)—Catholic Film Office with national and international functions both on theoretical and practical level. Rates features according to Catholic moral code, issues specialized publications, coordinates all Catholic Church activity in film sector.

Sindacato Nazionale Giornalisti Cinematografici (SNGC)—National (and only) pic critics association, which each year awards Silver Ribbons for outstanding film achievements.

Unitalia Film—Organization coordinating and expediting propaganda activity for Italian film industry abroad via publications, "film weeks" and other ventures in public relations sector.

INTERNATIONAL FILM ASSOCIATIONS

B.I.C. Bureau International du Cinema was constituted some years ago to examine and coordinate common problems relating to film industry on a world-wide basis. B.I.C. is made up of the following member associations:

FIAPF (International Federation of Film Producers Associations);
FIAD (Int'l Federation of Film Distributors Associations);
CITC (Int'l Confederation of Technical Industries);
UIEC (Int'l Union of Film Exhibitor Associations).

Chairman of B.I.C. since its formation: Ettel Monaco.

Working committee repping each organization within B.I.C.: Dr. Brisson for FIAPF, Dr. Schwalbe for FIAD, M. Trichet for UIEC, M. Weil-Lorac for CITC.

B.I.C. secretariat, with Achille Valignani and Enrico Giannelli in charge of Secretariat General, is located permanently in Rome's ANICA offices. Among principal objects of current B.I.C. activity is de-taxation of various film industries and bettering of tv vs. pic relations.

Video Cinematografica Nearly Alone In Italy To Develop Performers

Rome.

Only Italian production company which maintains and supports a permanent school for young thesps is Franco Cristaldi's Video Cinematografica. Video is also one of the very few companies in this country which keeps a number of actors—mostly youngsters—under contract. The two activities are interdependent, as the base of the school's activities (which may however be attended by outside performers) is the training of Video star roster.

Claudia Cardinale is probably the best-known star (and Video contractee) to emerge from courses at the school (which she still attends) into the international spotlight. More recently Thomas Milian has made a name for himself, while others, such as Serena Vergano, Barbara Bold, Margherita Girelli, Gianni Garko, Rose Cernuica, and Giuliano Gemma are awaiting their chances and picking up cameos in various Italian pix.

The Video school, which is headed by legit and pic director Luciano Lucignani, and is located some 10 miles from Rome in a country villa. Essential equipment includes sports, a tape recorder, microphone setup, a basic library, etc. Course began last September, and continues on a twice-weekly (sometimes thrice-weekly) basis, with "sessions" from 4 - 8 p.m. on Tuesdays and Fridays.

Director Lucignani claims the school has no strict "method" of its own, "though methods and techniques are discussed, from Brecht to Stanislavski to other newer ones". But basically, he notes, school is designed to prep youngsters for practical work in films, "enabling them to be more than inert objects in the hands of the director."

"We are not out to create great 'stars', but merely to discover, or to accelerate the discovery, of an actor's qualities, enabling him to work more profitably and probably more easily—and to keep him 'in training'."

CARLO PONTI

Champion Films has at least five slated for '63: "Ghost at Noon," with Jean Luc Godard directing Brigitte Bardot, Jack Palance, and Fritz Lang already started; "Yesterday, Today, Tomorrow," in which Vittorio DeSica directs Sohpia Loren and Marcello Mastroianni; Mastroianni also becomes "Casanova" for Ponti and director Mauro Bolognini; while producer has announced Bette Davis and Catherine Spaak in Damiano Damiani's "Empty Canvas," based on Alberto Moravia's "La Noia." "La Donna Scimmia" (The Ape Woman), with Ugo Tognazzi, and Arco Ferreri's direction, is item number five on Ponti's partial local listings, with more to come. First four are in partnership with Embassy Pictures.

ROYAL

After "Venus Imperial," Guido Giambartolomei produces "La Pupa," with Michele Mercier under Giuseppe Orlandini's direction, and "I Tabu" (The Taboos), directed by Romolo Marcellini. Also has Luigi Zampa prepping "Il Carozzone."

SANCRO

"Queen Bee" is finally releasable after censor trouble, as is "L'Omicida," directed by Claude Autant-Lara, "Adultress," Kafka's "The Castle," and other items being mulled.

TITANUS

With "The Leopard" a record-breaker here, Goffredo Lombardo has couple of items almost finished: "Il Demonio" (The Demon) and "Giovane Europa" (Young Europe), while recent company slowdown will delay such announced items as "The Challenge," with John Gavin, and "Tonio Kroger," directed by Mauro Bolognini, as well as other future plans.

Italy Holds Cost Line to '62 Levels; Still Less Than Britain and France

By ROBERT F. HAWKINS

Rome.

Contrary to some widely-circulated opinion, production in Italy can be achieved in many—not all—fields at about the same cost as last year and even, in some sectors, for less money than before.

It goes without saying that cost-cutting and "savings" can only be achieved by adroit, pre-prepared "shopping" and/or the use of a savvy local observer or one of the several reputed service companies which operate in Rome and are able to furnish anything from a non-venomous asp for a Nile epic to a cheese sandwich for hungry extras.

Though some costs (non-specialized) have risen, others (specialized) have dropped some because of less demand. The balance, when compared with 1962 figures, is about equal to last year's over-all totals.

Rating Italy cost-wise at 100, Britain would figure at some 120 and France higher, at 125. Spain has crept up some, cost-wise, since last year—at least in local estimates—and is rated about 90 to Italy's 100. Yugoslavia and Greece, less completely outfitted, figure at roughly 70 by comparison.

The Rome Studio situation is generally considered that of a buyers market.

Last year's boom brought with it several new plant ventures, led off by Dino DeLaurentiis' large new complex, as well as several other smaller studios erected to take advantage of space shortage occasioned by "Cleopatra's" protracted stay at Cinecitta, and by the booming Italian rhythm as well.

Now, though Cinecitta has several contracts for later this year, and though Titanus' Farnesina Studio is about to be parceled out as real estate, there is still plenty of open space in local plants. Hence, once again, buyers can be choosers—and this is said to apply in the equipment market as well, where prices last year had likewise risen over average. And the discounts are back again.

Exact figures being quoted in various sectors vary greatly and there are very few firm figures, except, perhaps some union minimums in the categories covered by these. But generally, it's still the savvy entrepreneur who can come up with the best deal. Meaning that in almost every bracket, the fee is negotiable.

TV Buys Yank Films; Rackets In Italy

Rome.

Though recently sealed with a non-aggression pact of sorts, the long-dormant war between the Italian motion picture industry and RAI-TV, the Italian television net has come out into the open, and both sides are fighting for key positions.

The situation has been brought to a head by several concurrent factors, first and foremost the recent purchase, mostly from Yank majors, of some 300 features to be screened on the single Italian video net, together with a massive buy of available US-made TV-Film material.

Okay Until Recently

Until now, Italian motion picture toppers could afford to worry less than some of their foreign colleagues about the TV menace; true, registered video sets in this country have swelled steadily to a record 3,500,000 but at the same time the Italian pic admission total had not dropped alarmingly. In fact, the local situation was one of the rosiest when compared to almost all film markets where television was on a competitive footing.

But recently, the psychological impact of a certain number of classic oldies, and especially an early Garbo series, brought the situation to a head, and industryites began to worry. This was compounded by the fact that the Italian press made of the series, of Garbo's "re-discovery," etc., with the result that attendance for the first time began to drop significantly on holidays and holiday eves when RAI-TV "maliciously" shedded the revivals.

Theatres Stage Protest

The Italian industry reaction was forceful and clear: over 800 film houses in the Rome area shut down tight for a day in "protest" against unfair competition from RAI-TV, and especially the fact that while the film industry is heavily taxed in every meter and activity, RAI-TV enjoys relative immunity in its new openly and directly competitive position—because of its government-subsidized setup.

The recently-agreed on pact between the pic industry and the television organization is, despite certain specific promises designed to avoid direct conflicts, a fairly vague one. Local observers feel the peace will be short-lived.

Meanwhile, the film industry is making the most of its opportunity in using the video danger argument as a major lever with which to win government de-taxation of all film sectors, felt a major step towards self-sufficiency in a growingly competitive entertainment world.

Runaways?: Italy's Got 'Em Too

Rome.

Runaways? An Italian problem too. For not only are Italian productions trekking to France, Spain, Germany, Yugoslavia, and other areas where reproduction lures make the trip worthwhile—even necessary — but be it for reasons of cost or the lure of the far-away the fact remains that rarely as in the past year have so many films been made outside their country. And the trend still appears to be going strong, if a frightened local film union report that out of 80-odd films begun by Italian companies so far in 1963, only 16 actually predominantly used Italian studio facilities.

Apart from the "Mondo Cane" type of feature documentaries, which make up a large percentage of these so-called "suitcase" films, the past year has seen quite a large number of foreign locations creeping into Italo production slates.

Around the World

One of the most distant was "Tikoyo and his Shark," made for Titanus-Metro by Paico Quilici on a Pacific Isle. "Copacabana Palace" took a flock of local thesps to South America, while another contingent is working in Russia on "Italiani Brava Gente" (Italian Good People), directed by Giuseppe Deffenitis. "Russia Sotto Inchiesta," a feature documentary by Romolo Marcellini and Leonardo Cortese, preceded it on Soviet soil, as did "Io Amo, Tu Ami" (I Love, You Love), directed by Alessandro Blasetti.

"Two Enemies," some time back, saw a local team go to Israel for locales, while several pix during the past year were shot in Egypt ("The Golden Arrow" for Titanus, and others). More recently, Alberto Sordi, director Gian Luigi Polidoro, and cameraman Aldo Tonti made a successful junket into Scandinavia and came back with a feature, "The Devil," (DeLaurentiis) which is currently big in local houses. Another DeLaurentiis item, "Man's Paradise," took an Italian crew to Japan, while one episode of Arco's "Rogopag" was shot in the Far East with Ramona Schiaffino and Bruce Balaban working there under Roberto Rossellini's direction. "Hong Kong—A Goodbye" is another Italo item shot in that faraway spot.

Run Away to L.A.

"Smog," directed by Franco Rossi, was made practically in the home of runaway-ism: Los Angeles. This switch on the Hollywood habit is not expected to be the last one, either. Dino DeLaurentiis plans to shoot most if not all of his upcoming "Sacco and Vanzetti" in the States—New England to be exact—with Richard Fleischer directing, while still for DeLaurentiis, Alberto Sordi will make "Custer's Trumpeter" in the American West.

In fact, the success of "The Devil" will probably see Sordi go through with his long-planned series of films shot in various parts of the globe, in which the Italian actor-comedian will be afforded ample opportunities to act and react in and to the foreign locales which increasingly are luring Italian filmmakers.

Censoring Goes Its Confused Way In Italy, But Eased

Rome.

Uncertainty has characterized the Italian censorship situation during the past year. Several dramatic cases helped further to focus attention on what still remains a problem to Italo film creators—as it does to those in many other countries as well.

Though a new censorship structure was set up last year, calling for a different composition of censorship groups (which now include film critics as well as production reps) as well as a stronger accent on the eventual and final decision by the Italian judiciary, the results have not been encouraging.

Irrational Behavior

It is not that censorship has become more strict; in fact, there are indications that in some sectors—notoriously a long string of cut-and-cut sexploitation pictures spotlighting nudity and striptease around the globe—it has almost become lax. Certainly films in which the subject matter as well as the treatment would never before have been passed, have recently been passed.

But it is the aforementioned uncertainty and seemingly irrational behaviour of the various organs able to exert direct or indirect pressure on local filmmaking which has become an increasing source of worry to local industry people. For while before the new legislation films which had been okayed were fairly safe once in release, now films previously passed by the various bodies risk (and have risked) banning by one or another of the Italian civil courts which have a final say on whether or not a certain feature is obscene, offensive to religion, or a potential danger to public safety—three major denouncers under the new censorial setup.

Also, it had been established by law that any such court action, if and when, should be initiated only in the city in which each film first had its opening in public. But here again, there have been cases of films opening in one city and banned by court in another.

The major censorship hassles (the minor ones are too many to mention) have during the past year centered around four films—three Italian and one Spanish-Mexican—all of which have made national headlines and triggered innumerable protest meetings and rallies. They are Luis Bunuel's controversial Cannes Festival winner, "Viridiana"; Gualtiero Jacopetti's "La Donna nel Mondo" (Women in the World); Marco Ferreri's "The Queen Bee"; and "Rogopag," a multi-episoder in which Pier Paolini's segment, "La Ricotta" was singled out.

Though there were cases of suggested cuts and other harassment, no US film had similar trouble or made similar headlines during the past year.

'Viridiana' For Example

The "Viridiana" case was a particularly confused one. It saw the film get its regular release visa, go into theatres throughout the country, then suddenly be called back and banned. It eventually won its case on appeal, but the damage to the local distributor was considerable nevertheless, since all bookings had to be cancelled and then resumed several weeks later, after massive public and press protests helped bring about a reversal of the decision. The film has not been "molested" since.

The case of "Donna nel Mondo" was resolved before the film reached the theatres, though here again previous bookings had to be postponed. A few scenes were re-edited, others were substituted, and the film finally emerged and is doing very well at the boxoffice. Ironically, the version still censored here has indirectly brought official Israeli Government protests because it shows some Israeli Army girls taking showers, naturally in the nude.

The third, more clamorous, incident was brought on by Paolini's segment of "Rogopag," which incidentally features Orson Welles as director of a film-within-the-film Crucifixion sequence which a Rome court felt blasphemous enough to sentence Paolini to a three-month (suspended) jail sentence. At the same time it banned the sequence, ostensibly forever.

Nothing Sure

Ostensibly, because with regard to Italian censorship procedure, nothing seems permanent or sure.

Take clamorous case number four: Marco Ferreri's "Queen Bee." For unspecified reasons, but apparently because of its non-conformist views on marital conventions and Catholic mores, the picture was banned before release and nixed once more in appeal. According to the local legislation, once appeal has been turned down, there is nothing a producer can do but shelve his picture. Yet a loophole was found nevertheless:

Slightly abridged, the film was re-submitted, with an important addition: a "new" title. Instead of "Queen Bee," it was called "A Modern Story: The Queen Bee." This time, it passed with flying colors, and is one of Italy's representatives at the Cannes Film Festival.

MIFED

international film, TV film and documentary market

a new outstanding success of the Milan Trade Fair

Since 1960 Milan has become a market of world importance in the cinema industry. Set in the heart of Milan Trade Fair and equipped with salons, offices and installations of the highest technical standard, this market is called MIFED.

Launched during the thirty-eighth Fair in 1958, MIFED, or the International Film, TV-film and Documentary Market, quickly attained the status of an independently run organization making its own arrangements and fixtures.

For this reason the Italian Ministry of Tourism and Entertainment readily granted it - all-quota - privileges for films coming from the United States, Britain, West Germany, France, Spain, Austria, Russia, Yugoslavia, Mexico and Argentina.

From the start success was such that those who attended the first Spring meeting asked for a second one to be held the following fall. Thus two annual events were established, one in April and the other in October.

In Spring MIFED benefits from the very wide response in all Continents to the appeal of the Milan Trade Fair. In the fall MIFED opens when the cinema industry's business year is in high season. After a very short period of gestation MIFED matured against a background of meetings, conferences, film presentations and good reports.

The latest meeting was the seventh. It was held from 12 to 25 April 1962, and it marks another step forward from levels reached in 1962. In that year 1749 films were presented of which 681 were full-length titles, 488 for TV showing and 640 of documentary nature. The two meetings were attended by 867 visitors, of whom 206 were concerned with the production and making of films and 581 with distribution.

Also noteworthy was the high volume of business done in the import-export branches, the successful agreements reached for film exchanges, and the stimulus the meetings gave to the utilization of audio-visual techniques.

Specials displays were organized in 1962 to demonstrate the progress of the youthful Japanese cinema industry and of Bulgarian production.

Conferences were convened and discussions held, and these were attended by experts and technicians from all parts of the world. Outstanding among these was the very important international conference on the application of audio-visual techniques to education and instruction in Africa.

MIFED's headquarters are located in a large building at the centre of the Milan Fair which it shares with CIS, the International Trade Centre. The floor space taken up by MIFED extends to over 30,000 square feet.

Included in these premises are ten salons equipped with up-to-date cine-projectors for showing 80, 35 and 16 mm films. There is also a series of conference and discussion rooms fitted with air-conditioning, duplicate electrical installations and interpreters' equipment for multilingual use.

For an organization of this kind these features are unique.

During 1963 an award, known as the MIFED-BIC Prize, is being presented for the best commercial film of the year. This award consists of a finely wrought gold and silver medal of the famous fountain symbolizing the four quarters of the globe and the main races of mankind. The original, by Bernini, stands in Piazza Navona, Rome.

Creed of the Oldest Festival

By PROF. LUIGI CHIARINI

Director, Venice Film Festival
(Professor of Cinema, University of Pisa)

Pisa.

It will never be sufficiently stressed that the International Exhibition of Cinema Art (as the Venice Film Festival is officially called), being one of the events of the Venice "Biennale" season, must remain on the same level of quality and artistic dignity as the Venice International Painting Exhibit and the drama and music festivals to which it is related.

When the first "Mostra" took place in Venice in 1932, the entire international press hailed date and event a most important one in the history of the motion picture, already then being named the art form of modern times. And in that respect it gained the approval and consensus of eminent artists and men of culture, beginning with Rene Clair, who participated at the festival with his "A Nous a Liberte" and who 30 years later was to be accepted as a member of the Academie Francaise as a high exponent of a profession "which has given a new movement to the representation of ideas and images," a profession which "has gained its right to immortality," as was affirmed on that occasion by Jacques de Lacretelle.

For 32 Years

Born, therefore, as an exhibit of film art, Venice has in that qualification its reason to be. Add to this the fact that the 32 years which have since passed have not only enriched the motion picture with new and important efforts, of which several brought to world attention at Venice, but have increasingly attracted the attention of artists and men of culture to this new language, as is proven by numerous and valuable studies, plus the fact that film history and criticism have become topics of universally teaching. The responsibility of the Venice Festival must therefore be considered greater than ever.

It's often asked: is it possible to find enough artistically valid films to justify such a rigorous stand, if so many difficulties stand in the way of proper choice?

Among these are, of course: the unreasonable number of Festivals, all of which now grow from the same lawn; the recurrent production crises; industrial demands which call for immediate exploitation of films, frequently "burning" those of highest value.

The objection is well founded. Yet, I feel that with all these difficulties, Venice still has its valid reason for existence. For an art exhibit—in all fields of contemporary art—can boast only masterpieces, or even completely successful achievements. In this field too, often, the various events reflect situations of crisis, of recession, of disorientation or search; the important thing, in my opinion, is that an exhibit reflect such situations with sufficient clarity, and exclusively from an artistic and cultural point of view in the spirit of that particular art form.

The motion picture must therefore be viewed in its entirety: as a show directed at the masses, as a means of communication and study, as a language which the artist lends to his particular means of expression.

The Venice Festival is therefore not one of trends of tendencies, but wants to remain open to all tendencies, rigorously excluding only such films which are in no single way significant, and drastically eliminating every commercial or "publicitary" design which cannot or does not meet its objectives.

Every other form of exclusion would however hurt the completeness of the festival, whose efficiency as such does not depend on the level of films, level which can in no way be pre-determined, but which relies on its organic and representative qualities.

It is this spirit which authors and producers (both large industrial groups and small independents) must understand and appreciate, just as must the public and the critics called to an event which wishes to underline the artistic and cultural values of the motion picture.

For this reason also, at Venice the films in competition, out of competition, and the retrospective showings all have an equal importance, just as like values are to be found in the feature event, the documentary festival, and the festival of films for children.

And the exhibit of film publications and the various study conventions which are annual features at Venice are not the frames for a social event or gathering, but an integrating part of an institution—Venice—which increasingly seeks to tighten the bonds linking the motion picture world with that of culture and art, in the very interest of the public at which this gigantic vehicle is directed, thus contributing to raise as well the general level of its equally important entertainment facets.

In conclusion, we hope also to attract to the Venice Film Festival some of the personalities in the fields of art and culture, not only to qualify the public at which the festival is primarily aimed, but also to stimulate meetings and exchanges of ideas with and among the exponents of film criticism and comment who traditionally cover the event in such large numbers and with such dedication.

Paresh Studio Active

Salzburg.

Film producer and owner of the Salzburg-Paresh studio, situated on the outskirts of this Mozartian festival city, has newly furnished the premises with modern equipment. Necessary facilities for cutting, mixing and synchronization now are provided. West German companies, Intertel, Formenton and Rony, have recently worked here.

There are three stages, 20 metres in 30 metres length and 8 metres high, and in addition 10,000 square metres open air territory.

Otto Duscer, who clicked with his film "Lulu" in international markets, is at present working on a motion picture titled "Magica," the story of a magician.

DORE'S DOOR HELPED BY U.S. SHOOTINGS

Rome.

American production companies have continued to use Italian facilities and backdrops for their films during the past year, though generally, and with one major exception, their has been a drop in such visits.

The exception of course is "Cleopatra." The 20th giant was practically a steady customer at Cinecittà during last year with its massive hunger for manpower and space, and with elaborate production activity in other Italian areas as well.

But there were other films as well. "The Victors" brought Carl Foreman in for a relatively brief period of location work some time back, while "Panic Button" teamed Maurice Chevalier and Jayne Mansfield under George Sherman's direction on Rome and Venice locations.

More recently, "Pink Panther" and its director Blake Edwards held down space at Cinecittà for the film featuring David Niven, Claudia Cardinale, Capucine, Robert Wagner, Peter Sellers and others. Jerry Bresler recently completed most of "Gidget Goes to Rome" — Paul Wendkos directly — against authentic Eternal City backdrops.

Otto Preminger's "The Cardinal" was likewise a busy location item in and about Rome for a spell this spring, after a similar stint in New England and Vienna.

On the upcoming slate are several items involving Joseph Levine's Embassy Pictures, but all of them are being made here by other producers, such as Carlo Ponti, even though in some cases Yank stars are involved.

Also on the 1963 agenda is "The Fall of the Roman Empire." The Samuel Bronston production is due into Cinecittà for some sequences, to be followed in the fall by another Bronston item: "The Circus," directed by Frank Capra and starring John Wayne. This one will headquarter in Italy though picking up sequences around Europe.

MAYBE DE GAULLE 'SAVED' BRITISH PIX

By HAROLD MYERS

London.

President Charles de Gaulle of France was playing his own political game when he successfully blocked the entry of Great Britain into the European Common Market, but there are quite a few British film producers who may be forever grateful to him. That is not exactly the reaction de Gaulle may have wanted, or even expected.

And while Britain remains excluded from the European community there are film producers all over the Continent of Europe resting envious glances at the local film aid legislation, which is so much more favorable than anything that exists or is even contemplated in Europe.

In the United Kingdom a British film producer can expect to get a direct return at least equalling 40% of the domestic gross via statutory Eady levy, or, to give it its official title, the British Film Production Fund. Yet the best they have been able to do anywhere in Europe—and not without a struggle at that—is the 14% subsidy which is available in France and Italy.

In these circumstances, therefore, it is easy to understand the apprehension of British producers, who feared that British membership of Common-M would affect Eady revenue. The principle of equal aids in industry had long since been established at the Brussels headquarters of the Common Market countries, and while the pro-marketeers insisted that the Eady scheme would remain unaltered, many producers were unconvinced by such assurances.

British Film production Fund, like the voluntary Eady scheme which preceded it, draws its revenue exclusively from a share of boxoffice income. Theatres with a weekly gross of under $840 are exempt from paying into the fund, but all others have to contribute a share from every ticket bought. The amount from each ticket varies according to the price of the tab, and the total annual yield is in the region of $18,000,000 to $11,000,000. The money is shared out among producers of British quota films in proportion to the earnings in the United Kingdom: the more the film grosses domestically, the bigger its share of Eady coin, thus paying a premium on success. Additionally there is a bonus for shorts and second features (costing under $56,000) and films in this category receive double the normal entitlement. That was introduced some time back to encourage the continued production of supporting features which, it is widely recognized in the industry, have very limited chances of earning real money.

'Havoreens' Example

There has, of late, been widespread inter-industry discussion on the present distribution system, but so far no-one has come up with a satisfactory alternative formula acceptable to producers. Not without some logic it has been argued that films which least need it get the biggest slice of the Fund's income, and in recent months the one outstanding example, always cited by envious producers, was the huge wheck which went to Carl Foreman's highly successful "Guns of Navarone." This picture had an exceptional domestic gross of around $8,500,000, and its Eady entitlement, therefore, totalled over $1,100,000. Less successful producers argue that "Navarone" could have gone along without such hefty chunk of the subsidy, and that the money could have been diverted to help other films which have struggled to break even. To his credit, Foreman himself was among the first to focus attention on this anomalous situation, and it is still a matter which is receiving the close attention of the British Film Producers Association and the Federation of British Film Makers.

Now contrast the situation in Britain with the rest of Europe. In Italy the long-standing film aid legislation provides film makers there with a 14% subsidy and only in the last couple of months or so have French producers been successful in getting their share of film aid increased from 9½% to 14%. It's a long, long way behind Britain's 40%.

The other major film producing country within ECM is Germany which, as of the moment, is still without any film aid legislation although there is widespread hope by producers in Munich, Berlin and Hamburg that a new law will soon be introduced. The final details of such legislation are now being discussed with the Federal Government in Bonn, but the legal experts there will surely be bound by the Brussels agreement which limited the French increase to 14%. Indeed, pessimists in Germany doubt whether that figure will eventually be accepted, particularly in view of some resistance from theatre men, who object to a further dent in boxoffice receipts.

British Exploitation Follows; Recent Fee–TV–Much Utilized; Practices Resemble U.S. Biz

By JACK PILER

London.

Television is no longer just the enemy here. With its overwhelming growth, film use video for exploitation. The so-called "captive audiences" are in fact susceptible to being catapulted out of their living room armchairs and into the picture theatres if the tease is right.

Television it seems is happy to give a hand; the glamorous attraction of top boffo names on the small screen is sufficient to move most, if not all the tv stations, big and small, to devote quite a bit of their weekly air time to purely film programs. There are regulations and agreements, of course with the Kinematograph Renters' Society keeping tight watch to see that the industry doesn't help snide video boys to cut the industry's throat or damage its image.

Five-Minute Rule

Most plug material, as distinct from straight advertising, is regulated by th five minute limit rule which the KRS operates, through tv companies are able to buy similar extra portions at $200 a minute over and above what is thought to be a fair free exposure.

But even when it is paid for no film can be shown on tv which doesn't in some way benefit that film's eventual career in the nation's theatres. As Metro's special exploitations exec George Skinner puts it, "Few can remember any tv company paying for clips, because no film company would allow excerpts from its films to go on tv if that was aimed at attacking or denigrating the picture or the industry as a whole."

But plugs are tried on every conceivable occasion and in addition bigger and bigger sums are being spent on paid tv air time. On the Judy Garland picture "I Could Go On Singing," for example, with a prestige image and a good boffo name, around $22,000 was earmarked for tv ads out of a total exploitation budget of $64,000.

And again, a large slice of the $140,000 which Columbia spent on the joint program "Pirates of Blood River" and "Mysterious Island" went on tv exposure. That double-header made all-time boffo records, ". . . directly," insists Columbia publicity topper Pat Williamson, "as a result of the ad campaign."

The Cliff Richard starrer "Summer Holiday" was one of the pic-out all-media attacks used recently by Associated British, a company that spends on an average $160,000 on a campaign. "While we are taking more and more space in daily papers and still using the stunt technique when it applies, we are spending growing percentages of exploitation budgets on tv ads," says vet publicity man David Jones, ABPC publicity topper.

"We did a lot on tv for 'Summer Holiday' because the star was a pop idol, big with the youngsters most of whom had never seen him other than tv. There will be quite a bit of tv used on the 'Punch and Judy Man' for the same reason. It stars Tony Hancock, a star made by tv. That's where tv scores as a publicity medium, when there is some distinct connection between tv and the picture or if the basic kind of story is one that finds big audiences on tv."

TV and Women

Prime example of this vein of thought, is the upcoming campaign that Williamson is mounting for "The Internes." The big punch will be a double-pronged one of tv and whole pages in women's mags—the first time so much money has been spent on film advertising in this section of the pulps. Being a hospital story it will find its way to the attention of the millions of addicts of it's medico skeins too, and that's where Williamson is going to plant his spots. The women's mags, understandably, because it is a natch women's picture. And all round a big tv budget for it.

But the other more traditional channels of exploitation will not be left out of this picture nor are they left out of other campaigns. Stunts—like the university students' charity "rag" weeks' tieins which Columbia will be working on "The Internes," or the flying of critics to Paris by Metro for the previewing of "Come Fly With Me," or Disney's 25 United States' trip for newsmen to view his picture "Bon Voyage," are still regularly considered and regularly used. Metro is running a stunt with an airline for a 14 day trip to one of the European capitals for two people as a competition prize, on "Come Fly With Me" and almost all the other airlines are sending rep hostesses to the preem in London.

Book Tieups

The book tieup is bigger than ever before in the UK with the enthusiastic ranges turning out books-of-the-film even when the original story has long before been published in novel form. And few paperbacks come out with a picture story that hasn't got plentiful stills wrapped around it. Newspaper serializations are found to be useful duect-buying bait. Disks are big too chiefly because more film music is of the kind that can be detached from the picture, dished and sold on its own merits. Albums are speedily tied up, picture stills smacked on to the sleeves and tieup ads drawn often before a film has been hewed in the music from the track is being plugged over BBC radio commercial and BBC-TV and beamed in from commercial Radio Luxembourg.

And perhaps most important of all: never before has the individual theatre manager been exposed to himself do all he can to push and plug his pictures and thump the tub for business. The Showmanship Award which Metro launched nearly 15 years ago is more keenly competed for by the nation's managers than ever before and ever since "Ben Hur" and the example which the company showed with this kind of picture, provincial managers no longer feel left out in the desert.

Fulldress preems wherever the picture opened throughout the UK provinces with all the trimmings and stars making sparkling po's revived the local manager's enthusiasm and today it is an accepted part of exploitation that when the picture warrants it provincial openings need not be any the less starry or pamepled than the London, New York or Paris openings.

ABC's "manager of the year" contest—which unlike Metro's which is confined to a manager's annual work on behalf of the renter's pictures only, judges a man's capacity as a good all-round manager with showmanship high on the list of qualities—also keeps the local stable popping with ideas. In the past this first prize has included all-paid trips to Hollywood and New York. This year the No. 1 manager pocked a check for more than $2,500.

Today there is a most definite new complexion about film publicity and exploitation and a lot of what is being thought and done today was inspired by the work of Joe Levene on his 'Hercules Unchained.' He taught the business here a fine lesson of horses for courses.

British Press Takes Note of Imports

There Has Been a Revolution In Trade Realities In United Kingdom As In United States

By KENNETH RIVE

(Managing Director, Gala Film)

London.

In the recently published lists of product for distribution in this country, my Company had on offer more films than any other three distributors, including British and American, added together, enough in fact to service a weekly change cinema with a double bill for two years.

This is, perhaps, the best illustration of the growth and extent of the International Film market in this country, and of the necessity to keep up a continued flow of product in order to support the growing number of cinemas that are now operating full time on an international program policy. In these days of the shortage of product, it would, perhaps appear that the degree of specialization in this market has diminished, that the very necessity of booking some kind of program has made the selling and marketing of international films easy and that their selling can conform to the general patterns of exploitation.

I have found that the reverse is the case. The handling of this product needs even more specialized knowledge, together with a continued realisation of the changing patterns of appeal, and of adjustments in their selling and exploitation to suit these needs.

Today the challenge remains as big as ever, for the gulf between failure and success is greater than ever. Some films barely earn enough to pay their censorship fees, whilst others can gross in the region of $500,000. A sober thought and one that further demonstrates the degree of specialization that is still needed in their promotion.

Everything changes, nothing remains the same, this is doubly-true for the international film.

A few years ago the major box office successes were those that offered the more erotic of these productions but, if any degree of stabilisation was to be achieved and a regular audience to be built, then the international film had to be one that widened its appeal and yet capable of competing on equal terms with British and American product, to audiences on all levels.

Formerly Ignored

A practical demonstration of the manner in which this has been achieved is perhaps through the film critics on our National newspapers. A decade ago the most a foreign film could hope gain was notice in the opinion-formers, The Times, Sunday Times and Observer. In all other papers a two or three line reference was made at the end of the reviews if you were lucky. Recently, films like "The Eclipse," "Les Liaisons Dangereuses," "Warriors Rest," "Sundays and Sybele," "Monde Cane," "Thou Shalt Not Kill," "Kapo," "Two Women," and "Through a Glass Darkly" gained main lead reviews in all papers, including the sensational "Sunday's" and the daily picture tabloids, above even the big British and American productions. These were gained not through the critics own leaning towards the international film but the growing demand from the readership of these papers for information and coverage.

The same has been found in the provincial press and in the popular magazines. Our own participation in this change has been the fostering of a close press relationship and linking current news and trends of appeal with our product, this changes all the time and we must also be prepared for change and adjustment, in fact to operations.

These are the broader observations on the international film market in this country, but to be more specific, I have found some basic principles are indivisible from successful operation.

Control of Strategy

The days of the distributor operating independently are past. He must have secured ready outlets for his product and in a manner giving him control on how the picture will be sold. The need for central administration of distribution linked to exhibition is vital, for it is from this that the whole future pattern of the films distribution and selling is formulated, and for the assurance of a regular supply of product launched on a national basis in equal competition with all other product. My Company now has in this country a network of cinemas, giving an assured national outlet for our product. In the West End 14 premiere houses operate on an international film policy against 13 on American and British, of these, seven are programmed by Gala.

In the earlier days of the international cinema, distributors were able to buy their product for a single territory. One or two successes a year of moderate returns gave a fair profit on the kind of terms they were able to buy these films. These days are past, it is no longer economically practical to buy for one territory and distribution has to be thought of on an international basis. Large capital is involved and producers no longer think of returns outside their own country as fringe earnings but vital to the financial success of their picture. The international cinema has become big business and you have to think and act big to compete.

Small Distribs

The practice, demonstration on how this has affected the market in this country is the failure of the smaller distributors to be able to keep a regular supply of product on offer. The finance now involved means that one failure brings the virtual collapse of the Company. Producers are no longer interested in negotiating either than the more off-beat or politically loaded film for one country. They also want assurance that a guaranteed system of exhibition is linked to distribution.

International cinema is no longer the field of the small operator. Such finance is now involved that more than ever he must have the flair, imagination, and a singleness of purpose to be able to compete on equal terms with the "majors," and to operate these principles on a world basis, keeping always abreast with developments in every major film producing country, and making sure that new trends are anticipated in his own programming schedule.

The same bigness of purpose is obviously reflected in all other fields of film promotion. With such finance involved, the selling of films can no longer rely only on the sensational shock appeal—they have to have the same planned overall publicity campaign as major productions from other countries, and this, by the very nature of the specialization must gain instant impact and be bold and original in its conception. The pressure—on these terms—must be continuous and prepared always to change—it is not the field for the faint hearted, for you must model and mould opinions rather than go along on the current waves of appeal. It's the field that presents the greatest challenge, both in program design and the grasping of opportunities to exploit them with showmanship and originality.

GOVERNMENT LOANS FEED U.K. FILMS

By JOHN TERRY

(Managing Director, National Film Finance Corp.)

London.

The National Film Finance Corp. is a specialised bank for film production established as a public corporation by Act of Parliament. Its funds come from Her Majesty's Treasury and the Corporation is answerable for their use to Parliament through the President of the Board of Trade.

When the Corporation was formed in 1949-40 British film production was faced with a crisis. Commercial sources were showing a marked reluctance to invest in films owing to a number of disastrous productions; and British Lion Film Corporation, around which was grouped a number of important film makers, was threatened with extinction through lack of capital. If the Government had not intervened there is little doubt that the volume of film production in the United Kingdom would have been drastically reduced, despite the strength of the two so-called vertical combines, Rank Organisation and Associated British Picture Corp. These two giants, which have important interests in film production, distribution and exhibition and also own their own studios, have made, and continue to make, a significant contribution to the financing of British films. But in 1949 it would have been too much to have expected them to add to their own burdens the load which British Lion and a number of smaller distributing companies had been carrying.

To Save British Lion

The Government—at a time when Harold Wilson was President of the Board of Trade—accordingly set up the National Film Finance with the immediate task of saving British Lion and enabling it to continue as a strong third force of finance and distribution outside the two big film combines and with the wider duty of assisting British independent film production generally.

The Corporation was originally provided with a fund of $14,000,000, $6,400,000 of which was lent to British Lion. Whilst over a period of six years almost the whole of that amount was lent, the loan enabled some 70 first feature films to be made, many of them of outstanding quality and appeal. When the old British Lion came to an end in 1954 the Government—a Conservative one this time with Peter Thorneycroft as President of the Board of Trade—decided that the business should be continued and a third force maintained. Thus a new British Lion called British Lion Films, was established at the beginning of 1955 with an issued capital of $1,680,000, all of it provided by the Government through the National Film Finance Corporation, and this company is today operating with conspicuous success.

Five Year Starter

The Corporation came into being for a limited period of five years in the hope that by that time film production would have become capable of obtaining all the finance it required from ordinary commercial sources. This hope was not fulfilled, for other crises and other problems have beset the industry, not least the competition of television. The initial period of five years was extended to eight in 1954 and to 18 in 1957, so that the Corporation's mandate now runs until 1967.

Revolving Fund

Similarly the Corporation's initial fund of $14,000,000 has been increased to $22,400,000. In addition to the $6,400,000 lost through the old British Lion, only a further $2,800,000 has been lost through the Corporation's other manifold lending activities. Approximately $11,200,000 remains, almost the whole of which is "out working." The fund is a revolving one and loans totalling well over $56,000,000 have been made over the years.

In order to understand the Corporation's special role in the British film industry it is necessary to know the usual way in which production finance is provided in the United Kingdom. The main distributors (and the so-called satellite financing groups associated with some of them, particularly with the new British Lion company) normally provide 70% of the budget finance, sometimes in cash but more often by way of a guarantee maturing 18 months after delivery and discounted by a Bank. This "front money" investment is secured by a first charge on world revenues and is therefore recoverable ahead of the remaining 30%.

Apart from a few exceptional groups, film production companies in the United Kingdom have very small capital resources of their own and in most cases can find only about 5% or so out of this 30% "end money." The balance of about 25% of budget finance is the unenviable preserve of the National Film Finance Corp. which, in effect, is called on to lend that part of the finance which no one else is sufficiently incautious to risk.

Originally the Corporation was only allowed to lend money which the borrower could not obtain "on reasonable terms from an appropriate source," but in 1957 this impediment was removed. Nevertheless the Corporation's resources are so limited that in the majority of cases it inevitably lends the "end money" which is not forthcoming elsewhere in order to fulfil its basic purpose of maintaining a strong home production industry. Even then however loans may be made only where in the Corporation's judgment the proposed film is likely to be commercially successful.

Judgment

How is this judgment exercised and how does the Corporation go about weighing a film's commercial prospects before it is made? Naturally the fact that a distributor is prepared to find 70% of the budget finance, albeit the safer money, is an important condition precedent but it is by no means entirely persuasive. If the distributor allows his investment to be recoverable pari passu, with instead of ahead of, the remainder of the finance—a pattern which the Corporation considers far more equitable and which it is always urging British distributors to adopt—the Corporation places greater weight on the distributor's confidence. In any event however the Corporation before reaching a decision studies all relevant factors including in particular:

(i) the records of the producer and director: It was an American banker who said "Give me character, not collateral," and it is often wiser to back the man of proven ability than the project of apparent worth.

(ii) the script: The Corporation has no panel of experts but relies on the views of its own experienced staff. The difficulty about experts is that they tend to be involved in the entertainment business and producers do not like their competitors, however honest and well-intentioned, to sit in judgment upon them.

(iii) the budget, the schedule, and the cromplot: These are examined in great detail by the Corporation's staff with a view not only to eradicating extravagance but to making sure that there is adequate provision for the demands of the script.

(iv) the cast: Here the Corporation does not insist on a star-studded list; on the contrary, so long as the producer considers his cast right for his film, the Corporation is pleased to encourage the trend away from the fabulously expensive star, unless he or she is ready to take a reasonable cash fee and rely for the rest on profits.

Assuming the Corporation agrees to lend for a particular film, on what terms will it do so? In the relatively few cases of "safe" lending which its limited resources permit (i.e. where the loan is fully guaranteed irrespective of the film's results) the Corporation takes a modest premium or a nominal share of profits. Generally however the lending is "speculative" (i.e. dependent for recovery wholly on the film's results) and here the Corporation takes a share of profits commensurate with the risk involved. For example, if a film is financed as to 70% by a distributor, 25% by the Corporation and 5% by the producer (a usual case), the money being recoverable in that order, profits will usually be shared as follows: the distributor 30%, the Corporation 35% and the producer 35%. The Corporation subscribes to the view that 100% of the finance should attract 30% of the profits. Thus the producer will be entitled to his fees, plus 20% of profits and to the extent to which he defers his fees or invests cash his share of profits will increase. Any profit shares due to individuals (e.g. authors or artists) as part of their remuneration and which the financing parties consider reasonable should come "off the top" before the foregoing percentages are calculated.

Many permutations and combinations of this pattern occur; sometimes the distributor agrees to make a smaller contribution (e.g.60%) but to its being recoverable pari passu with the remainder. In which event the producer as well as the Corporation should enjoy the benefit of parallel recovery; and where practicable films made by the same producer may be grouped for profit purposes: in either of these cases the profit-sharing described above will be suitably modified.

Profits as Offset

Profits on successful films help to make good losses on the failures. Because of the highly speculative position of the Corporation's finance it often happens that if a film is unsuccessful the whole of the Corporation's loan is lost.

The Corporation consists of a chairman and a managing director and such number of other members, not being less than three nor more than five, as the Board of Trade may from time to time determine. All are appointed by the Board of Trade which however does not interfere in any way in the day-to-day running of the Corporation or indeed in normal policy matters. This governing body, apart from the managing director, is part-time only and at present consists of one banker, two businessmen, a lawyer and an accountant, all eminent in their own spheres. The full-time staff numbers fourteen, a small figure when it is realised that the Corporation advances between $2,800,000 and $5,600,000 a year in over 50 separate loans.

During the years 1960-61 (inclusive) 736 British Quota films were exhibited as first features on the three major circuits in the United Kingdom. Of these, half were financed without recourse to the Corporation, for the main, distributors including in particular the American companies operating in the United Kingdom not infrequently providing 100% finance. The other half—368 in fact—were financed with the help of the Corporation.

If Quality Equal, British Product Tops U.S. 25%

London, May 7.

British films of comparable quality and star value gross 25% more than American pictures, according to D J. (Jack) Goodiatte, managing director of Associated British Cinemas. Speaking at a dinner in honor the company's champion managers, he said he looked forward to the day when American films would again measure up to British product at the boxoffice.

He recalled the old days when theatres were compelled to play indifferent quota pictures, but times had changed, and now he wanted to see the Yank product keeping pace with the native pictures.

Asserting that family audiences were fast disappearing, Goodiatte averred that the successful formula today was for pictures which appealed to youngsters. They had money to spend, and liked to spend it, whereas their parents mainly preferred to stay home and watch television in the front parlor.

He appealed to producers to "go for sex, and go for violence." These were the ingredients which helped to sell tickets at the boxoffice. Subsequently, Sir Philip Warter, who this year is celebrating his 21st year as chairman

Despite Friendly Discussion, He's For Brit. Tuners

By LESLIE GRADE

London.

As a comparitive newcomer to the film production scene many have asked me why I stuck my neck out and got involved with two film musicals. "They're difficult to make," people said. "We can't make musicals in Britain," said others. Well, the first statement is true, but with "The Young Ones" and "Summer Holiday" both starring Cliff Richard, we've already proved that the second remark is just pessimism. We decided to make "The Young Ones" because my colleagues and I were utterly convinced of Cliff Richard's potential as an actor and personality as well as just a pop singer.

We were determined not to surround Richard with a lot of other pop singers each doing his or her act. That's simply canned vaudeville. But when we found the right story and the right team we went ahead, under the Kistree Distributors banner, backed by Associated British Pictures. Jimmy Wallis, ABPC's studio boss, supported us magnificently and I doubt if we could have done the films without his enthusiasm. We budgeted "The Young Ones" for $462,000 but ran into some weather trouble and the choreography took longer than we

PARIS ONLY A MEMORY

GREAT NOW IN BRITAIN FOR INDIES

By VAL GUEST
(Producer-Director-Writer)

London.

(The text which follows was extracted by Dick Richards from an interview with the busy subject—object of the experiences detailed—Ed.)

The British independent film producer has never been in a stronger, and more exciting, position than he is at present. For he is working in a healthy British film industry which, but for the activities of the "indie," would probably be now virtually nonexistent.

Yes, the industry in Britian is healthy. The harsh period through which it went was a blessing in disguise. It helped to weed out, economically, the deadwood, the people, on all levels, who didn't really care about films. Now there is more money around for the right films. The more understanding attitude of the Censor has also helped considerably and now there is more latitude and leeway for making offbeat pix which, way back, would never have got off the ground. I regard "Room At The Top" as the film which blazed the trail and enabled the present British industry to grow up.

This is good for the producer who likes to go it alone. Unfettered by studio backroom politics he can make adult films and ones that are not parochial in their ideas and locales. Some 70% of modern British films are now "international" in their thinking and that's how it must be, for only the very cheapest films can live and prosper entirely on the domestic market.

But because the role of the indie producer is now far more satisfying and rewarding it doesn't imply that it is an easier life. Far from it. I've always insisted that the easiest part of making a film is when you are on the set and say "Action". The setting up is the rub. It requires patience, tenacity, cunning, stubbornness, self-confidence, a reputation for reliability and perpetual optimism. Given these qualities and a reasonable property the battle begins.

British indie producers can now, in reason, make the kind of films they want to make, without being constantly ridden by the distributors. Personally, I have never stopped to think what the public wants. As far as I'm concerned I am Joe Public and I make the films that interest me. That's the perpetual gamble one has to take and no amount of past success ever lessens the odds.

The distributor is still the major hurdle that an indie producer has to surmount. He is still on trial, but the distributor is now a much kindlier and more tolerant prosecutor. I find them more intelligent and imaginative than of old. Then, if you were to promise them 10 reels of, say, Dietrich there would be no argument. But now they look beyond the time and try to imagine the chemistry that will eventually supply the finished product. Then they used only to bet that what had proved good would still be good. Now, with the International star drawing names down to no more than six or seven if you include one director—Hitchcock, they've learnt it's the picture that matters.

PATIENCE is the supreme requisite for an independent producer. It was almost exhausted when I was trying to set up "Espresso Bongo". I had a West End hit musical, a cast of Laurence Harvey, Sylvia Syms, Cliff Richard and Yolande Donlan, plus a first-rate screenplay by Wolf Mankowitz. But for two years it was turned down flat by almost everybody. Fortunately, it eventually turned out to be a big success and many of the same people who had turned it down called up wanting to know why the deal hadn't been brought to them.

When "The Day The Earth Caught Fire" turned out to be another winner I was reminded that eight years had passed since I first wrote the story.

CAPITAL. What with rights for the musical "Espresso Bongo" and options on the services of the cast and the writer I found at one stage I personally was 70,000 bucks in the red and I hadn't even got a deal. That way a man can get ulcers.

Another good use for capital (apart from buying properties and selling) is that it is possible to make financial arrangements to keep a loyal team of technicians on hand. Most of my bunch has been with me for around eight years and, between my pictures, I loan them out. The advantage here is loyalty, knowhow and their personal pride in the finished result. I've found that technicians contracted to large studios rarely have that feeling of "This is my picture".

FINANCIAL BRAIN? Well, shall we say commonsense, contacts, a first-rate accountant and a record of reliability are musts. The process of setting up a film financially is much the same the world over. Main headache for the indie producer is the Completion Bond. The Completion Guarantors invariably wag their heads and insist that the budget isn't big enough and that the shooting schedule is too tight. And the Distribution Company insists that both the Budget and the Schedule are just fine.

That's the dilemma and, brother, here you need tact and the ability to put up your own Academy Award performance to get on the floor at all. Fortunately I've never yet had to touch a finance company to pay out on a Completion Bond. And that makes it easier? You're joking, of course.

An advantage for the indie producer is that he has creative freedom of thought, he can put over his own ideas and make the kind of films that interest him, and not be saddled with pix that the studio insists on him making. Studio space is now being offered on a competitive basis in Britain and one can take the studio that best suits the film and the budget.

The indie producer is not tied down to accepting any studio contract star simply because he or she is temporarily idle. I shudder at the number of times in the Dark Ages that I've been saddled with someone who, while a first-class performer, was hopelessly wrong for a particular role. Yes, you could argue, but you were only a contract man, too. Now, as an indie, one can cast the finest actors for the roles and, believe me, we in Britain have the best.

I am talking about actors. Not stars. But why worry about stars? Why pay fantastic sums to alleged stars, bearing in mind that there are probably not more than six in the world who can really boost the boxoffice? Apart from exceptional cases distributors no longer demand stars. The American film bosses tell me there is not one British star who is known throughout the States. Even people like Peter Sellers and Alec Guinness have barely broken through the art theatre belt. "The Day The Earth Caught Fire" made a star of an unknown, Edward Judd. "Lawrence of Arabia" did the same for Peter O'Toole, but still he hasn't yet penetrated the great world cinema masses. This new deal for British indies may yet put the "star system" into valuable economic perspective.

Some people regard it as a disadvantage that the indie producer in British films may lack the huge publicity machines that studios can put at his disposal. I don't necessarily regard it as a disadvantage. It seems to me that large sums of money spent on publicity before the film is made and while it's in the shooting stage is often money down the drain. I would far rather spend it on that deathly hiatus between picture delivery and picture opening. After that I find that the distributor is usually willing to back his judgment by dipping into the till.

Would I advise British film producers to become Independents? I wouldn't presume. It's something that each man must work out for himself. For my part, after making the odd film on my own I worked out a five year plan. For established companies I would make as many films as I could, films of all types and styles. Then I would decide whether I felt I was equipped professionally and financially to start up on my own.

I've never regretted becoming a lone wolf. Though I get butterflies every time I set up a new film I wouldn't trade my independent status for all the money in Fort Knox. Well, let's put it that I'd need an uneconomic slice of that money!

If in English Tongue, Mediocre Features Okay For British Nations; Germany Big, France Poor Outlet

By JACK PILER

London.

British producer-distributors are indubitably pleased by the improvement of playoff in the United States but it remains a greater truth of London film economics that the big earnings still come, Hail Britannia, from the component nations in the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Naturally there are difficulties and obstacles to profitable rentals in any country. This definitely remains true with the British-associated sovereign lands who nowadays are strikers of hard bargains with the Mother Country. Even so, there are no fences to speak of.

By far the most money earned by British pictures outside the home island comes from Australia, Canada, South Africa, New Zealand and the other Dominion countries. It is nothing like what it was as recently as a couple of years back from Australia and Canada, because both these countries are snake-charmed by television.

Dub The Rub

Nobody in London has any delusions about the reason: language. "As long as there is no need to think about dubbing or subtitling your picture, eight-tenths of your problems are solved," was the way one exporter put it. "You'd be surprised the kind of stuff the Aussies will take—the real corny British comedies that even large slices of the home market turns its nose up at. Africa and New Zealand present their unofficial censorship problems with many accepted subjects still taboo there. They won't easily accept, for instance, what can loosely be tagged as 'moral laxity'."

Despite an ailing industry, very nearly suffocated completely by the recent sweep of tv, Germany remains Britain's best foreign language market for dubbed pictures, better even than Italy which is undoubtedly the most cinema-minded country in Europe. There, last year, British pictures hiked their bo0ks take by 7% over '61 which had then been a "best" year.

Spain—despite its obvious Roman Catholic morality restrictions—could still be one of the best markets of the heap if the government can be coaxed to loosen the bureaucratic tape. If something could be done about the remittance ceiling and the government's restriction of 25 import licenses a year, UK producers are firmly convinced, Spain could be a good market. The unpredictable censor they would be willing to suffer.

At the bottom of the income pyramid are France and Japan—France because of a mixture of reasons. It isn't the subject nor is it the stars which attract: the French public largely prefers the Gallic approach to life and its portrayal in pictures. Japan, on the other hand, is purely restrictive because of its own tremendous output and the staggering growth of tv. British producers, having to share out just 10 licenses this year for export to Japan, just don't reckon the place.

British Weekly Take Decline

London.

The following chart indicates the steady and continuous decline in picture theatre admissions and boxoffice grosses in the U. K. over the past years. The peak was reached in 1951, when weekly attendances topped 30,000,000. At that time there were over 4,000 picture theatres, whereas the total currently has dropped to just over 2,000. Weekly averages are given.

	No. of admissions (in Millions)	Gross boxoffice (in Dollars)
1956	22.7	$5,694,000
1958	21.2	5,600,000
1957	17.6	5,012,000
1958	14.5	4,032,000
1959	11.6	3,724,000
1960	10.0	3,528,000
1961	8.9	3,276,000
1962	7.9	3,164,000

Uphill All The Way, British Okay In U.S.A.

London.

British producers seem at last to be driving their way into the American market. Never before, in fact, have they marked up the kind of sales they are enjoying at the moment, and the trend seems upward.

Today the American market is responsible for more than half the total world export earnings of British pictures. Even taking into consideration quota productions made by the local affiliates of American companies, like Columbia and U.A., there is still a positive and substantial easing in the resistance to British pictures in the States.

According to the last official figures available via the Board of Trade here, in 1960 British pictures earned abroad a total of $17,-660,000. Of that, $8,520,000 was earned in the dollar area—predominantly from the States. In the previous year (1959) earnings from the same areas had been $8,-240,000. While it is true that in 1960 the ending of the Anglo-American film pact made more money flow directly across the Atlantic so swelling the actual total of dollar earnings shown in the books, it would still not account for an increase something like 2½ times.

And the totals for years subsequent to 1960 are bound to show up with increases over that year when such spinners as "Guns of Navarone" ('62) and "Lawrence of Arabia" are taken into consideration. Pictures like "Dr. No" and "Call Me Bwana" with their quota rating must also help swell the totals for this current year. In fact it appears that far from being the clamlight, unassailable eldorado of traditional British picture hustling, America is fast becoming the most important single market for the local product.

Around the world the picture of British picture exporting—and all of Britain is still being exhorted "export or die"—is a brightening one. It isn't easy to sell pictures anywhere in the world but one of the easiest touches for the British producer is the Commonwealth. The bulk of what is left after U.S. earnings are reckoned off, comes from Australia, Canada, South Africa, New Zealand and the other commonwealth countries. It is nothing like what it was a couple of years back from Australia and Canada because both these countries are at the moment in the tight grip of tv with its novelty element still working strongly in Australia.

No Lingo Problems

Language is a great help because it removes the worry of having to dub or subtitle. And, as one exporter put it: "You'd be surprised the kind of stuff the Aussies will take—the real corny British comedies that even large slices of the home market turns its nose up at. Africa and New Zealand present their unofficial censorship problems with many accepted subjects still taboo there. They won't easily accept, for instance, what can loosely be tagged as 'moral laxity'."

Despite an ailing industry very nearly suffocated completely by the sweep of tv, Germany remains Britain's best foreign language market for dubbed pictures, better even than Italy which is undoubtedly the most cinema-minded country in Europe. There last year British pictures hiked their boffo take by 7% over '61 which had then been a "best" year.

Spain—despite its obvious morality restrictions—could still be one of the best markets if the government can be coaxed to loosen the webs of bureaucratic tape. If something could be done about the remittance ceiling and the government's restriction of 25 import licenses a year, UK producers are firmly convinced Spain could be a good market. The unpredictable censor they would be willing to suffer.

At the bottom of the income barrel lay France and Japan—France because of a mixture of obtuse reasons, one of which is the definite dislike the French public has for any but French homegrown talents. It isn't the subject nor is it the stars which attract: the French public largely prefers the Gallic approach to life and its portrayal in pictures. Japan, on the other hand, is purely restrictive because of its own tremendous output and the staggering growth of tv. British producers, having to share out just 10 licenses this year, just don't reckon to place.

Studio Conditions In Sundry Lands

London.

To paraphrase that guiding light of the Lost Generation, Gertrude Stein, a film studio is a film studio is a film studio. This has become apparent from lookovers at many film centres around Europe, and naturally the U.S.

There is the guard at the gate and the commissaries that resemble each other even if they serve different dishes. The sound stages and the hurry-up-and-wait aspects. Actors have their own dressing rooms, or, if less important, sit around in groups.

Equipment in many places in Europe is American but with also a big smattering of French cameras and German sound units. Even people take journalists to the directors, stars, etc. and the producer, if he may not take the creative power he does stateside, is getting to be more than the moneyman in Europe, which he usually was till recently.

But bigger budgets, coproductions and specialized fare also brought the producer's name up to the director level. The latter is the main recipient of film reactions but such producers as the French Raoul Levy, Paul Graetz, Henri Deutschmeister, Edmond Tenoudji, Georges De Beauregarde, Pierre Braunberger and others now have gotten recognition for certain type features and tendencies.

In Italy Dino De Laurentiis, G. Lombardo, Alfredo Bini and many others rate international attention as some do in Germany too. Time of work may differ from the noon to 7 p.m. French system as opposed to the U.S. early morn start. Tea breaks in Britain, wine stops in France, aperitifs in Italy and coffee in America cancel each other out.

U.S. may still have the technical equipment and organization lead in Hollywood but new studios abroad are playing them a close second. The burgeoning Yank production in foreign spots the last few years raised wages and also led to more material and technical comforts.

The strict union differentiations in Hollywood work has not caught hold too, seriously in Europe. A prop man might pitch in to move a set, etc.

College Curriculum Cinema

By THOROLD DICKINSON

London.

If five years ago I had been asked the question Should Britain Have a Film School? I should have answered No the best way to learn a job is to go in at the bottom and work your way up. This is the standard opinion of the majority of craftsmen in the British film industry. Or it was five years ago. The industry was over populated, continuous employment was a struggle. We had vaguely heard of schools in other countries, but conditions here were obviously different. There was no time for research, for examining the long view.

But what was obvious even then was that while our industry had a reasonable record in commercial results the British film was rarely acknowledged in other countries as having made any solid contribution to the development of the medium. It took on the average so long to get to the top of the profession that newcomers who stepped across into films from prominence in another medium — theatre, literature, television — brought more vitality with them than those who had spent much of their strength in climbing within the medium.

So you had to choose between people with ideas and little experience and people with experience who had come up the hard way and lost much originality in the process. What is the result? Fully 80% of the more memorable British films are adaptations of works which have already been successful in other media, particularly as plays and novel. The number of memorable British films, conceived as cinema, is minimal. That is the reason why in other countries it is largely the British documentary and the British film that are regarded with respect. It is among them that you find originality.

The need seems to be to give a concentrated education so that cinematic originality can emerge at an age when vitality is at its strongest. Anyone with ideas who wants to make films is usually told that the best way in is by exercising nepotism. Are you related to an influential person in the industry? That is a pretty shallow approach. Next best is to write and publish a story or play with an eye on its being filmable. If you sell the film rights, make it a condition that you work throughout the production in an advisory capacity. That is a deeper approach and one less harmful to the future of the industry. But in that case why not go in with some advance knowledge and some experience. You can only gain that experience by emigrating and learning another language, unless you are wealthy enough to be able to study in the film and tv schools in California when you will only have to emigrate.

To explain the university approach to cinema, let us examine the situation at the University of Pisa in Italy and compare it with our own here at University College London. Both projects began in the autumn of 1961 but Pisa was rather more ambitious. The University there founded a Chair of Cinema and made cinema an optional subject in an arts degree course. The financial and general sponsorship of the Department is provided by the Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografia, which is the long established training school for film and television in Rome. Its funds are provided by the Italian Treasury through the Ministry of Tourism and Spectacle. The staff consists of a professor, an administrative assistant and a secretary.

Equipment

There you have adequate good equipment, good conditions for research and critical appreciation, a degree for the students to work for, a proper respect for the first new art form in several hundred years. In London the situation is different. As regards equipment we are nearly as complete. Our great disadvantage is that we are forced to spend the equivalent of one salary on film hire. The only films supplied free are those distributed by members of the Kinematograph Renters Society. The work of the department is entirely in the hands of one lecturer, aided by a part-time secretary.

Academically, the subject of cinema is regarded as an extra with no examination or diploma. Each year two post-graduates receive grants for research and are expected to write theses, and the results are already more than promising.

The Backers

Our department has been set up for the provisional period of five years and financed entirely by the generosity of the British Film Producers Assn., the Rank Charity Trust and the Associated British Picture Corp., together with a smaller sum from Associated-Rediffusion. Our aim during the five years is naturally to persuade the University authorities that our work is indispensable.

Every nation sooner or later finds the need for a national effort in cinema and television. The need for a training school was first felt by the Bolsheviks when they proclaimed the Soviet Union in 1917. Anything less like a union in those early days could not be imagined. And by 1922 nine-tenths of the Russian film industry had emigrated, unable to toe the party line and therefore unable to support themselves. In 1919, after less than two years of socialist effort, the Communists commandeered the luxury restaurant in Moscow where Rasputin had been murdered, and Lunacharsky, the Minister of Culture, undertook to turn it into a film school. This was one of those strokes of imagination which Russians are prone to when they are up against it. It was not until two years after the end of the blockade and five years after the school was set up that the results began to be apparent. But times of national stress are a sure impetus to imaginative film making. And the world has learnt by now that if you have to choose between an abundance of new equipment and a surge of skilled imagination, backed by a sense of national purpose, it is the mind that counts, not the material.

Today the school is housed in another, much bigger building close to the permanent Exhibition of the Soviet Peoples on the outskirts of Moscow City. Scarcely anyone enters the Soviet film industry without graduating from this school. It is a vast organization with an average of 800 students and 500 corresponding students who came to Moscow twice a year for seminars. The annual budget for such an establishment must amount to the equivalent in our values of more than $2,000,000 a year.

Other Countries

The second country to found a school of cinema which has survived to this day was another totalitarian state, the Italy of Mussolini. The Centro Sperimentale de Cinematografia was intended by Mussolini to be then a film school. The staff, as in any art school, has always consisted of a permanent nucleus, augmented by a much larger number of part-time teachers on a rota system which brings them to the school during their periods between full-time production.

When Mussolini fell, established directors like de Sica, Rossellini and Visconti produced by reaction the neo-realist movement, and the second wave of directors who followed them were the former students from the Centro, the directors Guiseppe de Santis, Pietro Germi, Luigi Zampa, and more recently Francesco Maselli and Nanni Loy, Mauro Bolognini and Michelangelo Antonioni. And the producer Dino de Laurentiis, the designer Mario de Matteis. The actor, Massimo Serato, and actresses, Alida Valli, Clara Calamai, Carla de Poggio. Quite a list.

A third school which has developed no mean record was started in Paris in 1942. The French cinema has a habit of surviving its tribulations, but the worst one of all was the humiliation of the Nazi occupation. After two years of suffering when French films were being made either under collaboration or on sufferance, Marcel l'Herbier, the film director, gathered a group of friends together and founded a film school to prepare new blood to revive the French industry if ever the Nazis were thrown out.

With its two-year courses the French school, I.D.H.E.C., as it is affectionately known by its initials; Institut d'Hautes Etudes Cinematographiques, has not only contributed a steady flow of trained craftsmen to the French industry but is training French-speaking students from all over the world, particularly the Arab countries and the new African and Asian nations deriving from the former French empire. Its influence is vast.

The fourth of the great film schools arose out of a need as great as the Russian. The second world war virtually blotted out the Polish film industry. Today the Polish film has a high reputation for creative merit, for steadiness of output and for solvency. This rebirth and development to a higher level than ever before is largely due to the work of the Polish film school; there is scarcely a film craftsman in Poland today who is not a graduate of Lodz.

There is only time to list the film schools elsewhere: two in West Germany, and one each in East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Spain, Hungary, Greece, the Netherlands, Argentina, Taiwan, and new ones beginning in Egypt, India, Belgium and Yugoslavia. These are the 19 schools recognized by the International Centre. There are also some 30 universities in the U.S.A. which acknowledge cinema as a subject, and some of these, particularly California and Southern California, give a professional training.

As I have already suggested, Britain has a reasonably well developed system for the layman to study the film but outside the U.S.A., where students find living too expensive, there is no English-speaking film school.

Should we, like the Italians, the French, the Poles and the Russians, have a film school? I would now say emphatically Yes. Can we afford it? 19 other countries can. For the cost of one large jet aircraft we could set up a school for 100 students and keep it in operation for 20 years or longer.

British Film Producers Assn. Offers Plan For Pix Making Efficiency

London, May 7.

An eight-point formula for increased productivity in British film production has been prepared by a special sub-committee set up at the start of the year by the British Film Producers Assn. as part of a National Productivity Year campaign. Its terms of reference were to consider technical suggestions to improve productivity within the industry.

In a prelim survey, the committee has already made certain suggestions to the BFPA, some of which have been referred to the technical committees for further investigation. Serving on the BFPA panel are T. E. Knight of Pinewood, Harold Payne of Associated British, and A. W. Watkins of Metro British, with Baynham Honri and E. A. R. Herren as joint chairmen.

Among the recommendations already submitted to the BFPA are: unnecessary takes spell inefficiency; clutter on stage, whether equipment or visitors, is to be deplored and should be vigorously controlled; more time should be spent in production preparation, including rehearsals; weight of scenery, sets and property should be reduced by greater use of new materials; and traditional floors and fixings should be altered in the light of new shooting techniques.

The sub-committee has also suggested the need for setting up a central research organization.

Swiss Grope for Boxoffice Angles

Only Three Features Made in 1962—Outlook for 1963 Slightly More Encouraging

Zurich.

Swiss film production was caught in a dead end the past year. After a temporary upsurge two or three years ago, when local production activity reached a new high, at least in quantity, 1962 turned out to be a year of disaster. Only three Swiss films were produced during the entire 12 month period, of which one, "Schneewittchen und die sieben Gaukler" (Snow White and the Seven Jugglers), was a co-production with Germany. It proved a boxoffice dud, despite the fact that this color musical starred Caterina Valente and was directed by one of Germany's top comedy directors, Kurt Hoffmann.

The other two features were both Swiss dialect comedies. One, "Es Dach ueberem Chopf" (A Roof Over Your Head), was a good grosser, but "Der 42. Himmel" (The 42nd Heaven), did disappointing business and was clobbered by local scribes.

In view of these results, the Swiss producing companies Praesens-Film A.G. and Gloriafilm A.G., both in Zurich and operating as a joint venture, are currently in the middle of what may be termed a "period of adjustment." It means the imperative realization that a new line of thinking has to be found to survive. Pure escapist fare and insipid local comedies, as recent experience has shown, just cannot compete with television anymore since this quality of amusement can be had for free on the small screen.

Need Fresh Themes

Max Dora, production head of Gloriafilm, hopefully sees a possible solution in an energetic concentration on more "substantial" themes and topical Swiss problems treated in a thought-provoking, adult manner—themes which are usually foregone in tv. At the same time, however, it becomes increasingly difficult to find knowledgeable screenplay writers, especially from the younger ranks. Many tradesters agree that here lies the core of the Swiss film crisis.

Of the Swiss product output for 1963, one Praesens (Lazar Wechsler) production in particular seems to reflect this new attitude. Tagged "Sittlichkeitsverbrecher" (Sex Criminals), it is a semi-documentary feature film, in four episodes, treating the increasingly alarming problem implied in the title, restricted, however, to the seduction of and criminal acts against children by sex bums. Treated in an honest straightforward style without false sensationalism, the Franz Schnyder-directed film has been made in close collaboration with the Zurich police. It is based, for the most part, on actual cases from police files and intended as an urgent warning to parents who, out of carelessness or false shame, are partly to blame for such happenings as well as allowing sex hoboes to run loose due to failure to report them to the police. Filmed mostly on location in Zurich, the picture has been cast predominantly with unknown amateur players and members of the police playing themselves. In several scenes, a number of name legit players from the Zurich Schauspielhaus handle cameo roles.

A recent Swiss-German co-production, "Das Feuerschiff" (The Fire Ship), made by Praesens in collaboration with Fono-Film Hamburg and directed by Ladislao Vajda, is a dramatic story of a signal ship captain terrorized by three escaped criminals and paying with his life for his refusal to help their escape to Denmark. It has been filmed on location at Malmoe, with interiors done in Hamburg and Berlin. Columbia has this one for Germany. It stars James Robertson-Justice as the captain.

"Im Parterre links" (Ground Floor, Left Door), a Gloriafilm-Praesens production in Swiss dialect, with mostly local players and directed by Kurt Frueh, looms as a predominantly local item. It is a family comedy-drama about a streetcar driver and his family problems. Made entirely in Zurich on a shoestring budget, it has a chance of recouping its modest investment from local showings alone and, if well received, making a profit.

For the remainder of 1963, the only advanced Swiss project is another co-production, this time with Germany and Spain, and again directed by Vajda who is also responsible for the original script, together with Stefan Bekeffi. Tentatively titled "14 Treffer" (14 Winning Numbers), it is described as a comedy-drama about the lottery fever in Spain. Shooting is scheduled to start in May at the Chamartin Studios, Madrid, with additional scenes possibly to be filmed in Germany. Swiss actress Lilo Pulver will play the lead. Distribution for Germany has been picked up by Columbia and Praesens will release it in Switzerland, while Omnia-Film G.m.b.H. in Munich has world distribution rights.

New Release Pattern For London Suburbs Tilts Film Takings

London, May 7.

The recently launched new release pattern for the London suburbs—splitting all of greater London into two simple halves north and south of the river Thames—is working well. In fact, it is showing slightly increased takings.

This was reported to a recent meeting of the Joint Committee of the Five Associations and the report tabled at the last meeting of the exec committee of the Cinematograph Exhibitors Assn.

As a result, the CEA has asked the Kinematograph Renters Society, with which it worked out the new release pattern, to investigate the possibility of making similar alterations to the release systems in large provincial centres like Manchester, Liverpool and Birmingham where there was a similar pattern of inner city core and outlying suburban ring. The KRS has agreed to do this.

POWELL'S NEW OUTFIT TO FILM 'WEIRD MOB'

London, May 7.

Michael Powell's newly-formed production company, Williamson-Powell International Films (U.K.) Ltd., is to make its first film in Italy and Australia. It will be "They're a Weird Mob," an adaptation by Roger MacDougall of Nino Culotta's bestseller, and production is expected to start in October.

"It is a black and white comedy," Powell said, "and should take about eight weeks to shoot and cost around $330,000. I'm very excited at filming in Australia and I hope will be able to help to stimulate the industry there. In Australia, there's tremendous potential in talent, enthusiasm and, technically, it's as good a place to work as anywhere I've seen. I find the whole scene invigorating."

Powell aims to show an Australian image that is not generally visualized by those who have not visited the country. "In fact," he insists, "I'm hoping to turn out the first Australian film in which you won't see a kangaroo."

Cannes Conversation Piece ...

"It simply can't be done...

Despite what you may be told to the contrary, it is IMPOSSIBLE to obtain original negative quality from a dupe negative. The only way to get release prints of original negative quality for WORLD DISTRIBUTION is to deliver your negative to one of the three Technicolor plants situated in Hollywood, Rome and London, so that matrices can be made and delivered to all Technicolor plants for making "first generation" DYE-TRANSFER release prints for world coverage.

I'm going to contact the Technicolor people at Cannes."

British, Too, Slow in Development Of Stars Rating 'Internationally'

By DICK RICHARDS

London.

Let Britain's film big shots peer through the smoke screen of their Corona Coronas and yak through their post-prandial brandies till their eyes are seathed, and the waiters have gone home: they are still faced with a grim fact. The number of British film performers who are international "boxoffice" remains depressingly, ludicrously minute.

There is a modern wave of film makers who dismiss this painful fact as negligible. But there are a number of dedicated casting directors and cash-conscious agents who still hope to come up with The Name which will sweep the wickets from Plymouth to Perth, via Patagonia, Paris, Pekin, Pisa, Penang, Pietersburg, Prudhoe, Perth and Pittsburgh. It is a source of constant embarrassment over here that a lot of British film star names are a dead loss in the U.S. outside Manhattan. So the fascinating search goes on for a new Peter O'Toole, Laurence Harvey or Hayley Mills. They have made import on America!

This time last year, blonde, unknown June Ritchie was bracing herself for her first screen role in "A Kind of Loving." She pulled off a tricky role with plaudits, followed it up with another screen in "Live Now, Pay Later" and is currently playing a night club hostess in "The World Ten Times Over." This qualifies her in this dizzy, jet-propelled showbiz, as a current British star. But she has far to go to earn the "international" accolade.

Pat-Pat Tushingham

Rita Tushingham has celebrated her 21st birthday, her marriage, a benevolent "Best Actress" nod by Bosley Crowther and a Silver Globe Award as "The Outstanding Future Star" by the Hollywood Foreign Press Assn. But, after "Taste of Money" there were six bleak months when it looked as if her success in that pic was going sour. No offers. She has since made a couple of pix not yet released, and her next film will see her co-starring opposite Peter Finch which, in Britain, at least, will help this promising youngster's career.

Valerie Gearon? A slight disappointment. Her role as an Indian girl in "Nine Hours to Rama" didn't quite jell. But the girl has what it takes. After Mary Peach's stint in "Eagles," with Hank Bodman in Hollywood, Miss Peach has done nothing, but she will be back in the fray soon. Shirley Anne Field's contribution to "The War Lover" has yet to be seen here. Chesney Hahn Whitelaw, a hit in "No Love for Johnnie," is just finishing "The Comedy Man" with Kenneth More. But this talented actress needs rather more screen exposure than she's currently prepared to offer if she is to blossom to her full extent. Barbara Shelley is still lost in the wilds, to her loss and that of British product. You can't make a screen rep without films and unlucky Miss Shelley is not getting the significant ones. Just the small-time stuff.

At last report, the careers of three actresses were fairly dormant. Mary Ure, Maggie Smith and Rachel Roberts. Since then, Miss Ure has stolen notices in "The Mind Benders" with Dirk Bogarde and Miss Roberts; the same in "This Sporting Life" with Richard Harris. Maggie Smith has been profitably engaged and earned laurels on the stage, and is now about to be seen in the upcoming "V.I.P.'s," the Liz Taylor-Richard Burton starrer.

But these three cannot be regarded as new British discoveries. It's simply that their talents have been shamefully un-deployed during the past two or three years.

Re Sarah Miles

Then there is Sarah Miles, who leaped to local fame on the strength of her performance with Sir Laurence Olivier in "Term of Trial." It capped her the Gt. Britain Variety Club's Award of 1958's "Most Promising Actress." Coming up are her performances with Bogarde in "The Servant" and with Laurence Harvey in "The Ceremony." Further assessment must wait. Susannah York looks a more substantial bet. She got away to a modest, yet warm, start with Sir Alec Guinness in "Tunes of Glory" and, in different mood, with Kenneth More in "Greengage Summer." Nothing sensational, but highly promising. But by the time that this tipster has to report again next year Miss York will have come up with three leading roles. With Montgomery Clift in "Freud," with Albert Finney in "Tom Jones," and with William Holden in "While the Tiger Sleeps." If these turn out to be a winning treble instead of losing trouble then Miss York is the most likely contender of the lot for world stardom.

Of the rest, named last year as hopefuls, Heather Sears, Virginia Maskell, Virginia McKenna and Joan Plowright have virtually not been entries.

Truly Newcomers

So, who are the new contenders? Interesting prospects are Julie Christie, Kathleen Breck, Annette Newman, Barbara Windsor and Samantha Eggar. Miss Christie gave a fair performance in a rather colorless role in a slight comedy, "The Fast Lady." But when Tessy Jane had to drop out of her role through illness, Joseph Janni cast Miss Christie as one of Tom Courtenay's girl friends in "Billy Liar." Since the pic is an important one to Janni it suggests a confidence which must make this newcomer a sturdy runner in the star stakes. Equal confidence by shrewd, veteran casting director Robert Leonard in the potential of Kathleen Breck is worth noting. This South African girl makes her first screen appearance in "W.11." Leonard describes her as "the most exciting prospect he has seen in years" and even allowing for the film exec's natural exaggeration, it's worth going along with his opinion. At least until the film is viewed.

Samantha Eggar made a lively debut in "The Wild and the Willing," and part Hale Barbara Windsor an even livelier one in "Sparrows Can't Sing." Miss Windsor has a touch of the Marilyn Monroe gaiety about her, but may be hard to cast. Miss Eggar impresses more as a potential dramatic actress. Annette Newman, a pretty, sharply alert brunette with distinct S.A., has had to struggle against the problem of being the wife of Britain's top screenplay writer, Bryan Forbes. Inside remarks suggest that she gets her roles by influence. It isn't true. Performances in a couple of recent pix, notably, "The Wrong Arm of the Law," indicate that Miss Newman has a talent which might well flourish.

Verdict: A fair flow of new female talent seeping into British films. But are there any world-beaters among them? Obviously this assessor would put his modest bet only on Miss York, with a cover on Miss Miles. He may live to regret his caution.

Peter O'Toole, eventually let out of desert captivity with sunspots, sunburn and a built-in allergy to camels, fully justified his long, arduous chore in "Lawrence of Arabia." With the possible exception of Peter Sellers, "Toole has become Britain's hottest screen property. His next will be "Becket" with Richard Burton and, with this film, O'Toole's future is in the inevitably secure hands of Peter Glenville.

Richard Harris' performance in "This Sporting Life," came off handsomely as tipped last year, and Harris, following his appearance in "Mutiny On The Bounty," emerges as a blazing new screen personality and, particularly, a man who won't compromise with his career.

"Tom Jones" will be this year's milestone for Albert Finney and it is predicted that he and Susannah York will strike up instant h.o. chemistry in this film. He has just formed his own company with Karel Reisz, the man who directed him in "Saturday Night and Sunday Morning," which indicates topline Finney progress in the future. Tom Bell came off in "L-Shaped Room," as did Tom Courtenay in "Loneliness of the Long Distance Runner" and with rather less impact, in "Private Potter." "Billy Liar" is Courtenay's next big hurdle in the career stakes. Alan Bates, who made an impression in "Whistle Down the Wind," looks towards "The Caretaker" to advance his career. He is also making a film called "Nothing But the Best," a comedy in which he will be partnered by Millicent Martin. Here is a girl who has rocketed to fame by her appearance in the controversial BBC program "That Was The Week That Was." She herself may well become a big film name. The film careers of Edward Judd and Patrick McGoohan are advancing steadily, if not sensationally.

Stamp Collects

Terence Stamp's performances, widely contrasted, in "Term of Trial" and "Billy Budd," nominate him as one of Britain's more exciting young presences and Stamp, even at this early stage of his career is thinking and talking in terms of international stardom which, in this biz, is a third of the battle. Last year this report gave the come-on sign to two young pop singers who were aspiring to screendom. Cliff Richard followed up his click in "The Young Ones" with an even greater b.o. woe in "Summer Holiday," and Richard's screen career is healthy. Not so peppy, though, is that of Adam Faith. He essayed a dramatic role opposite Anne Baxter in "His Ex & Hers." The film flopped with a dull thud and it must be confessed that Faith, who had too obviously strode too soon out of his thumping range, did little to help it. Young Faith and his advisers must shortly take stock if he is going to recover from a very inauspicious start to his screen career.

Of new possibilities Richard Johnson, an experienced stage actor, but known in only smallish roles in a few films, is named by the experienced producer-director-writer Val Guest as the greatest talent that Britain has. Says Guest: "Johnson is undoubtedly an actor who is going to achieve international stardom." Fighting words. Johnson has a big role in Guest's latest film, "80,000 Suspects" but Guest is too canny a film man to make a remark like that just to tie up with a picture he is making.

So note Johnson as a distinct future star possibility.

Lovelies

Lovelies with Richard Harris as the most explosive personality to appear recently on the British screen recently are James Booth and Sean Connery. Booth has made a few films, the lamentable "Western" called "The Hellions" and as the young man who blackmailed Peter Finch in a film about Oscar Wilde. But, in "Sparrows Can't Sing," Booth emerges as a screen actor with infinite and varied knowhow. He blends comedy, a touch of the heavy and a streak of the offbeat in his performance. Booth is clearly a potential big-timer. Connery, playing secret agent James Bond in "Dr. No," helped to blast himself and the film into the headlines with his performance. This lanky charmer is likely to be tied up for awhile with Bond films (he is now making "From Russia, With Love") but he looks like getting some bright offers in the future.

Ian Hendry is a personable young man who made his mark in a comedy called "Live Now, Pay Later," and Ian McShane, who bowed in "The Wild and the Willing." Oliver Reed, nephew of Sir Carol Reed, Darren Nesbitt and Dudley Sutton all seem likely material worth encouraging but who have yet to prove their full merit.

anticipated. Eventually the budget hit $500,000 and ABPC didn't turn a hair.

"Summer Holiday" was planned as a much bigger film and this time Jimmy Wilde okayed it without worrying about the budget. It turned out to be $1,120,000. "The Young Ones" will certainly gross around $1,400,000 in the United Kingdom alone. "Summer Holiday" will outgross that by at least 30 per cent and has even greater world potential.

We expected the films to be difficult to make and they were. But Kenneth Harper as producer, the two directors, Sidney J. Furie and Peter Yates, and Herbert Ross, the choreographer, all did fine jobs. All this and Richard's talent too and I figure that we were not on such a gamble as many people generally prophesied. Elstree Distributors is not going to concentrate on musicals alone. In fact, we recently buried "Sparrows Can't Sing" and the drama, "The Servant," with Dirk Bogarde. But we are certainly planning another musical for Cliff Richard and I think, with the right talent blended into the right chemistry, Tommy Steele, Frankie Vaughan and, particularly, Frank Ifield could all be big film bets.

of Associated British, said he was not against pix and violence as such, but the essential thing was to make good pictures.

Leonard G. Lamm, manager of the ABC, Harrow Road, London, now one of the circuit's two major provincial theatres in the city, was named winner of the circuit's showmanship contest, and received a check for $2,100. The runner-up, Ronnie Cave of Oxford, collected $700.

Youth's Marks on Sands of Time

[A Calendar of the 'New Wave']

Paris.

No further away than these columns, prominently displayed last in International Film Editions of earlier springs, the "New Wave" movement was dissected and pronounced dead. For what perspective value it may offer to the students of shifting cinema tides, this is a chart for liquid space explorations. The movement went like such as this:

1948—The year when critic Alexandre Astruc penned his idea of the personal type of film that was like writing and a purely director's kind of filmmaking. Newcomer Jean-Pierre Melville made his "Silence of the Sea" on his own and secured distribution.

1949—Jean Rouch's first ethnographic film, "Circumcision," got theatrical airing. Critic and film museum founder Georges Franju's first pix, a short, "Blood of Beasts."

1950—Eric Rohmer, Jean-Luc Godard and Jacques Rivette come up with a new film mag Gazette Du Cinema, all for personalized filmmakers, which lasts five monthly issues. Alain Resnais makes his noted art shorts "Guernica" and is primed for his "Van Gogh."

1951—First issue of Cahiers Du Cinema with Rohmer, Rivette, Godard, Jacques Doniol-Valcroze and Francois Truffaut under the editorship of Andre Bazin.

1952—Astruc made a medium length pic "The Red Curtain" that earned critic award.

1954—Truffaut attacked the rather conventional, literary look of French films and extols the Yank dynamic and personal approach and calls for a new mode in French pix. Agnes Varda, a femme still photog, made her first pic "La Pointe Courte" edited by Alain Resnais.

1955—Resnais' noted short on concentration camps "Night and Fog," and Astruc's first feature on drifting amoral youth "Les Mauvaises Rencontres." Latter is a flop but gets big comment.

1956—Roger Vadim created Brigitte Bardot in "And God Created Woman" and Rivette, Godard, Jacques Demy and Chris Marker display their first shorts.

1957—Truffaut made his prizewinning short "Les Mistons" (The Kids), Louis Malle his first pic "Ascenseur Pour L'Echafaud" (Elevator to the Gallows) with a Miles Davis score and wins a top critic award.

1958—Claude Chabrol's "Le Beau Serge" impressed shown out of competition at Cannes Fest and shortmaker Jacques Demier won a nod for his first pic "Ceba," based on an Arab legend. Chabrol started "Les Cousins" and Truffaut "The 400 Blows," while Rouch wins a critic award with "Moi Un Noir" (I A Negro).

1959—"Beau Serge," "Cousins" and "400 Blows" released for good biz. At Cannes Fest, "Blows," "Black Orpheus" won prizes and Resnais' "Hiroshima Mon Amour" was honored shown out of competition. "New Wave" expression coined by weekly L'Express.

1959-61—The begining of a flurry of pix by Rivette, Rohmer, Doniol-Valcroze, De Broca and others leading to the bandwagon tactics of producers. Jean-Luc Godard's "Breathless" a hit and makes Jean Seberg a name here.

1960—Noted newcomers make star pix, like Truffaut, Godard and Chabrol, and talent is absorbed and others make their one pic and disappear. Resnais' "Last Year In Marienbad" becomes a specialized hit and Miss Varda makes a dent with "Cleo from 5-7" and Demy does good art, if not regular, biz with "Lola." Now the fad passes and from here on newcomers will infiltrate regularly and not on the heels of a movement, fad or revolution.

The banking of first pix may be noted. One that gets big play at the Cannes Fest 'til Critic's section "Adieu Philippine" is still not released. So problems continue but the wave goes into history.

AID UNDERGOING A REVOLUTION

By GENE MOSKOWITZ

Paris.

There is not one problem, of course, but many problems which combine to retard happy times in the film industry of France. The crisis of early 1963 was an echo of a neglect in 1957 when the Treaty of Rome laid the groundwork of the European Economic Community more familiarly the Common Market. Too little thought was then given to the problems of films and practically nothing was done to protect the theatrical film, important to French prestige around the world, from the spread of television, a monopoly of the French state.

Attendance at French film theatres has been steadily diminishing for many years. Inflation is a factor in France as in the United States and other capitalistic lands. Frenchmen are building homes, buying household appliances, new cars and all the rest so that France itself is prosperous while the film industry suffers.

A chorus of heartfelt misery which was raised in January of this year. Showmen headquartering in Paris spoke direly of a strike against their own government. In the end it was not the French government alone but the authorization of a rise in subsidy rate by the Common Market bureaucrats in Brussels which gave the producers their break. Up from the previous 5½% of government aid French filmmakers will hereafter get 14%, or on a parity with the aid the Italian producers get from the Rome government.

Treaty of Rome made it clear that internal governmental aid for any industry should not give special advantages that would put that of other signatories at a disadvantage. So it forced France and Italy to make changes in their aid setups.

Italy's Better Break

However Italy wisely kept its aid up and only went from 16% on local grosses to 18% the next year, and then held it there in spite of ECM opposition, while France began to lower its aid successively, proposing to wipe it out by 1966 in favor of easier loans and "quality" pre-production handouts.

But France last year was forced to keep aid at 5.5% on local receipts and 22% on foreign grosses instead of 5% and 20% when bankruptcies threatened. Italy meanwhile got solid monetary bolstering through the growing American production there.

Italy also spurted in competitive quality and went after foreign playoff in a big way. Contrastingly, West Germany went into a decline and was forced to reconsider film aid. Overall the attendance at the 25,000 hardtops within the Common Market countries fell 15% and grosses 10% in spite of admission price hikes.

Production fell alarmingly in France and Germany. Benelux countries made hardly any features so were not involved in this, but their exhibitors did also feel falling attendance. Italy's boxoffice held up but may begin feeling it soon.

France's bid for a raise to 14 to 15% aid, without aid on foreign grosses, had to be finally accepted by Brussels ECM headquarters. But France still needed a big cut in the over 30% tax on film grosses as well as a tightening up of its distrib and exhib arms.

Small Exhibs

And tax cuts to small exhibs, with low interest loans to bigger ones, have also helped keep them out of the squabble for a while. But mergers of distributors and less production may be the keynote. Some fear that the French may relapse into cheap, local product that could be recouped at home with aid and forget about the importance of foreign marts, even if they have been off of late.

Parisian Film Showmen Ponder Long, Don't Ape U.S. Tuners, Greek Tragedies

Paris.

France came into 1963 on tired legs. The talk of a "producers' strike" was evidence of a deep malaise. For a time it was uncertain whether the Common Market at Brussels would go along with a rise in French government subsidy for producers since the European Economic Community ostensibly is dedicated to the lowering and removal of such subsidies. Meanwhile there was a good deal of studious attention devoted to film economics generally.

One reality which stood out was "West Side Story" (UA). It was entering its second year, and probably good for another, in its first-run at one Champs-Elysees house. It plays continually at capacity which is almost unheard of here since it is a musical and with subtitles to boot.

Other Yank tuners come and go. Meantime French showmen have mulled idea of getting into a modern film musical other than the hokey-pokey kind of "operetta."

However, nothing definite has been developed. One heard again about an old Raoul Levy idea to pair Frank Sinatra and Brigitte Bardot in a musical to be shot in both countries. Rank that up as unadulterated rumor.

Jacques Demy, in a recent interview, declared he was readying a picture in which all the dialog would be sung. It will detail a destruction of a couple by the recent Algerian war. Demy did not say whether there would be any dancing and was not sure of the starting date. He plans to use Michel Legrand for the music.

A French musical, to be co-directed by Gene Kelly, "Silhouettes," has been "announced" several times but seems no nearer reality. Comedy director Philippe De Broca is reportedly preparing a tuner with Jean-Pierre Cassel. Jean-Luc Godard claims he made a U.S.-type tuner sans music with his "A Woman is a Woman" and would someday like to try the same experience with music.

So a tuner of local origin may be imminent or far off.

Producers have separately taken note that the stark, cathartic, beautiful elimination of a Greek tragedy "Electra" (UA), by Greek director Michael Cacoyannis, is now in its fifth month of its first-run at two small houses and has pulled in over 180,000 admissions. It has surpassed many weighty and expensive French and Yank items including "Mutiny on the Bounty."

Hence emulation is possible in this department. What price French tragedy a la Racine or Corneille? Showmen await Robert Bresson's "The Trial of Joan of Arc" for encouragement. Actually this sort of film has rarely attracted French filmmakers and the Greeks may have the thing cornered.

Comedie-Francaise filming of two classic comedies came-a-cropper and this too may have thinking producers not too keen on canning these old plays.

1962 DIMENSIONS OF FRENCH TRADE

Paris.

Here are basic statistics covering the French film industry during 1962.

EXHIBITION

There were 5,788 theatres showing films. This was a loss of 51 since year before.

There were 2,726,787 seats in these film houses. This figures one seat for every 16 Frenchmen.

Of these theatres, 23%, or 1,346, collect 55% of the grosses.

Admissions for the year: 312,-000,000.

Average cost per ticket: 45c.

Ticket sale was off 24,100,000.

France has 72 theatres (20 in Paris) geared for 70 m.

PRODUCTION

Total of 178 features in 1962 contrasted with 208 year previously.

Of total 89 were wholly French or with France the majority element in coproduction.

Production expenditures in 1962, including coproductions, amounted to $68,270,000.

Color features: 17%.

Widescreen process films: 29%.

21 of 58 Recent Hottest Tickets In Paris: Yankee

Paris.

A look at the 1962 and early 1963 top grossers in Paris first-runs, which usually are reliable index to subsequents, shows U.S. product holding its own, with 21 of the 58 that sold over 50,000 admissions.

Preeminent was Darryl F. Zanuck's "The Longest Day" (20th) which went way over 500,000 admissions at two houses in over 20 weeks. Followed release of "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs" (Disney) selling 300,000 tickets in 10 weeks. Big third was "Mozart" (Par).

French fondness for adventure pix and eaters showed with "The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance" (Par) and "Counterfeit Traitor" (Par). Then another Disney with "Nikki" and the still first-running Cinerama-Metro pic "How the West Was Won."

Orson Welles' "The Trial" did well here. Also shining was UA's Greek pic "Electra" of Michael Cacoyannis.

"Taras Bulba" (UA), did well. UA suspense item, made in English with French, Italian and Yank backing, Anatole Litvak's "Five Miles to Midnight" starring Anthony Perkins and Sophia Loren raked big attendance. "That Touch of Mink" (U), "Mutiny on the Bounty" (MG), the surprise showing of "The Interns" (Col) and "Barabbas" (Col) were others to roll bonanza billets.

An English lingo pic made by Yank director Joseph Losey in Italy "Eva" followed. There was also "The Lion" (20th), "The Errand Boy" (Par), "Cape Fear" (U), "Sweet Bird of Youth" (MG), "Lonely Are the Brave" (U) and a reissue of "Rear Window" (Par).

French product was mainly in the exploitation and spec range with comedies and some more offbeat art fodder also drawing. Brigitte Bardot starrer "Warrior's Rest" was topper. Then a heavy but still potent costume-melodrama, Andre Hunebelle's "Les Mysteres De Paris," with a sketch item "The Devil and the Ten Commandments" and a situation comedy "How to Succeed In Love,"

FRENCH FILM MARKET ALONGSIDE FESTIVAL

Cannes.

Alongside the regular Cannes Film Fest, May 9-22, will unspool the "Film Market" underwritten by the French Film Producer Assn. Several houses have been hired in town to allow producers from any country to show their pix free to the press and prospective buyers alike. Screenings are from 9:30 a.m. to 8 p.m. from May 10-12.

Market's rules technically accept pix made after April 1962 only, with some attempt to select to keep this more commercial and addition to the fest as high a basis as possible. It also gives airings to pix that may have been unjustly turned down by the fest or by national selection committees. Last year press reports wondered why Jean Renoir's "The Elusive Corporal" was not in the running.

At The Drop Of a Legacy, Paris Critics & Actors Turn Directors

By GENE MOSKOWITZ

Paris.

Young filmmakers have been a sort of hallmark of Paris since the war. Youth came on scene big. Big in dreams of its own talent. Big in contempt for older men whose producing and directing were denounced as hackneyed. Paris is uniquely the home of organized interest in silent films and of bull sessions about story-telling approaches, camera angles and all the rest. Here, too, the film critic is prone to turn producer, partly because it was, until recently, possible to do so at moderate cost. There is little or no comparable evidence of American film critics attempting to show their elders how to do it.

At the peak of the excitement which the young men created among themselves, and about themselves, the term "new wave" came into vogue. It spread from France to many other countries from which echoes were later heard. In the United States the French "new wave" was perhaps misunderstood, too few Americans realizing that the ideal directors of the French youngsters were nearly all Hollywood veterans. This was only one of the ironic facets of the whole movement. There was also the fact that many of the rebels were against nepotism use money from family, hence nonlocal, sources to finance their rebellions on screen. The final irony came after a few years with the great number of "new wave" features which could find not outlet at all. Many of these films (from a grand total of 100) still have never been seen.

Jean-Gabriel Albicocco—Now 27. Did some shorts before "The Girl With the Golden Eyes," a very stylized, updated version of Balzac tale more interested in technique than narration. Has since made "Le Rat D'Amerique" a tale of a Frenchman's adventures penniless in South America. "Eyes" was made in '61.

Alexandre Astruc—At 39 more a precursor than actual waver. Was a critic who did a medium length and prizewinning glossy pic "The Red Curtain" in '52, and his first feature "The Bad Liaisons" in '55 on drifting youth in Paris. Has done several more features but never a true hit.

Jean Aurel—Is 30. He was kicked off his first pic by Brigitte Bardot, "The Black Reine," when she did not like rushes. Replaced by Vadim. Has since done a successful compilation pic on the First World War "14-18." Was once a film critic.

Jacques Baratier—Had several shorts to his credit and made his first feature at 30 in '57 "Goha," and recently a fantasy "The Doll." Noted for his technical prowess.

Jean Becker—30 and son of late noted director Jean. One feature "A Man Named Rocca" which was solidly made but uneven in outlook.

Claude Aubert-Bernard—33 and specializing in problem pix usually too overdone for top impact. Made first pic in '58 "Shock Patrol" on the Indo-China War.

James Blue—33, a Yank who scored with a lyrical look at Algerian life "The Olive Trees of Justice" made in '62. It was a French-Algerian pic.

Marcel Bluwal—33. A tv director who made a good atmospheric first pic "The Freight Elevator."

Jean-Claude Bonnardot—40, has several shorts done, one feature on the Korean War "Moranbong" still pixed here and a recent taut thriller "Ballad for a Hoodlum."

Serge Bourguignon — 35 and a graduate of the local film school, the IDHEC, as well as of many shorts on Asia. Hit with "Sundays and Cybele" felt deeply poetic in the U.S. where it is probably more respected than in France.

Philippe De Broca—30, an assistant to kingpin Wavers Claude Chabrol and Francois Truffaut and then his first feature "Love Games" in '59 considered a fresh comedy. Followed up with other comedies and clever costumer "Cartouche."

Marcel Camus—now 51, was a longtime assistant then with his second pic "Black Orpheus" won the grand prize at the Cannes Fest of '59.

Alain Cavalier—32, with one pic "The Fight on the Island" in 1962 a sharply made but unclear portrait of a young fascist. Promising start and protege of Louis Malle ("The Lovers").

Claude Chabrol—33, a pioneer Waver who made his first pic "Le Beau Serge" on his wife's inheritance money. Was a critic, wrote film books and worked for the 20th-Fox publicity department here.

Henri Colpi—42, edited "Hiroshima Mon Amour." His first pic "A Long Absence" won the Grand Prize at Cannes in '61. Style is sharp and sometimes poetic.

Jacques Demy—32, made shorts and his first pic "Lola" in '60 showed a poetic flair if uneven structure and narration. Latest "Bay of Angels" is more developed but still lacks narrative power.

Michel Deville—32 an assistant and then showing comedic flair in "Tonight or Never" in '60. Has followed up with two more stylish comedies alas marred by too much striving for elegance. Most promising of sophisticated comedy directors.

Jean Dewever—36 did shorts and one feature in '60 "The Honors of War" about a little incident designed to show the misery of war. Somewhat too mannered but displaying good filmic flair.

Jacques Doniol-Valcroze — 43, an ex-critic on monthly Cahiers Du Cinema, spawning ground of many first Wavers. Specialties in glib, elegant comedies of manners, not much in the Wave more personal, on-the-spot, downbeat subject tradition and personalized tales.

Michel Drach—33, assistant who made a sincere if somewhat overdone look at racism in "No Burial on Sunday" in '59.

Robert Enrico—32. After prizewinning shorts and now his first feature "The Good Life." More technically solid than most newcomers, but less personal and arresting.

Pierre Etaix—35. Background of music hall comicking. First feature "The Suitor" displays a sure film comic find but still needs a firmer feel for a feature and an expanding of gags and outlook.

Georges Franju—51. Noted for shorts. Then a solid first feature in '58 "Head Against the Walls." Has a strong personal shock quality in his pix.

Armand Gatti — 39, journalist and playwright with one film on a concentration camp "The Enclosure" to his credit, showing a strong human feeling without sentimentality.

Paul Gegauff — 41, author responsible for the sharp, earthy dialog of Chabrol's pix and has recently directed his first "Le Reflux" not released as yet.

Claude De Givray — 30, critic and assistant of Truffaut who, with his "Sad Sack," has shown a good slapstick visual flair.

Pierre Grimblat — 37. From advertising films. Zanily inventive gangster pic "Do That to Me" gave promise of a solid commercial comic director to come.

Henri Gruel—40, did many fine comic shorts and is now winding his first feature.

Marcel Hanoun—34, showed promise in tv but first feature "The Eighth Day" too precious and mannered. Made in '59 and nothing since.

Jean Herman—30, made good shorts and now preparing his first feature.

Pierre Kast—43, critic and made shorts and a series of literary and talky pix. Some clicked here but have yet to be exported.

Jean-Luc Godard — 33, critic and then with "Breathless" showed that jump cuts, brash techniques, overlapping dialog and a look at immoral youth could turn into a hit pic. Has followed up with others and then his recent well made study of a girl slipping into prostitution "Live Her Life." Turned wife Anna Karina into a star and started a new foreign career for Jean Seberg.

Leonide Kolpel—33, assistant and shorts and one heavyhanded psychological pic "Leviathan" to his credit. But shows fine technical flair and could be heard from.

Joseph Lisbona—31, was critic, distributor and then a producer. Wrote and directed a satire on filmmaking "The Crab Basket" which was uneven but showed sincerity if a lack of insight into character. But could blossom into a good commercial filmmaker. Now preparing a pic.

Louis Malle — 31, showed good form and film knowhow in "Elevator to Gallows." His "The Lovers" has upset reformers in Ohio and other American states. Has tried various type pix culminating in Brigitte Bardot starrer "A Very Private Affair."

Chris Marker—42, noted short film essayist now making his first feature on people in Paris in a documentary style called "Jolly May."

Christian Marquand—36. Was an actor in several Wave pix. Just finished directing his first feature "The Big Roads." Opts for action pix over artier.

Jean-Pierre Melville—45, considered Wave forerunner when he made pic on own in 1948. Has since been adopted by Wavers and industry.

Jean-Pierre Mocky — 34. Actor-turned-director with pic "The Girl Chasers" in '59. Pix are wry and gritty.

Francois Moreuil—28, a lawyer who made one pic "La Recreation" with Jean Seberg, his ex-wife. A visual feeling but confused storytelling.

Marcel Moussy—39, dialog for Truffaut pix and one feature "Saint Tropez Blues" which is conventional but pleasant. Preparing another.

Jean-Daniel Pollet—27, made some good shorts but a feature that reportedly can not be edited. Will try again. Feature "The Demarcation Point" was done in '59-'60.

Francois Reichenbach—39, fine documentary eye with latest on a young boxer, "A Heart As Big As That" a prizewinner but slow at boxoffice.

Alain Resnais—41, noted for shorts prior to his nervous-making but admired art pix "Hiroshima Mon Amour." Went on to story-less "Last Year in Marienbad." Now winding third pic perhaps best technician of all the younger newcomers if still too obscure for many tastes.

Jean-Louis Richard—36, actor gone to directing. Shows an okay if still derivative style.

Jacques Rivette—35, critic with one pic, "Paris Belongs to Us," considered pretentious by many on its look at a strange global conspiracy but also highly touted by some critics. Preparing another.

Alain Robbe-Grillet—41, author in the new novel manner where character is secondary to description. Wrote "Last Year in Marienbad" and just finished his first pic as director "The Immortal." Reportedly it is more hermetic than "Marienbad."

Eric Rohmer—43, editor of Cahiers Du Cinema and critic who made one pic "Le Signe De Lion" in '58. Uneven pic, about a Yank's downfall in a hostile Paris one summer, it was a flop but had its backers.

Frederic Rossif—41, did tv film compilation shows and then two expertly mounted features from old footage "The Time of the Ghetto" on the infamous Warsaw Ghetto, and "Die in Madrid," on the Spanish Revolution.

Jean Rouch—46, an ethnologist whose films on Africa showed a definite filmmaking flair. Has since done many documentary-type films with non-actors that have garnered fest prizes and boxoffice. Started the so-called "Film Truth" movement.

Jacques Rozier—37, some good shorts and then a witty, airy look at youth today "Adieu Philippine" which got fest attention but has yet to be released.

Agnes Varda—35, femme photog whose '55 feature "La Pointe Courte" is considered a Wave forerunner. Recently made a prizewinning feature showing a knowing filmculture and ability "Cleo from 5 to 7."

World Festivals: Their Traits

Gideon Bachmann's chart (opposite page) has avoided the word "importance," because sometimes a major festival can be less important for a specific purpose than a small one. All categories are graded from 1 to 5, with 1 being the highest grade. Festival marked X have a specific character, either purely national (XN) or cumulative (XC) ("festivals of festivals"—events where only winning films from other fests are screened). Generally speaking, "Size" indicates the overall scope of a fest, the number of stars and "big" pictures that can be expected, the degree of internationalism, the mundane effort, and the society participation (in the case of communist festivals, read "political hierarchy participation" for the latter). Note that my gradings do not necessarily correspond to those of the FIAPF; there are more "A" fests than "Size 1" on my list. Size also generally indicates the amount of newspaper space a festival commands.

Commercial Importance. This is seen from the US angle. The grading here is valid for both importers of foreign films and export of US product.

"Amities aspect." Festivals usually not only show films in their program, but also provide a measure of cooperation with producers who bring films not invited as part of the official program, and screen them on the side for the buyers present. In Cannes all these screenings take place in the various cinemas of the rue d'Antibes, which are requisitioned by an organization called "International Film Market" for the period of the festival. The IFM has its own separate office at the Carlton Hotel, and either for a fee, or sometimes for free, producers can have their films scheduled on the rue d'Antibes. It then becomes their business to get the interested parties to come and see them, which is not always easy, because competition for viewing time is fierce, and many films run simultaneously.

Not every festival has an IFM, but a certain degree of "Antibes" activity goes on everywhere. Thus the index in this column serves to tell producers the degree of likelihood that their films will be seen if they take them to the respective festivals uninvited and out of competition.

U.S. Prize Importance. This is simply the degree of importance, from the commercial point of view, in U.S. release, of prizes gained at various fests.

World Interest. This measures the degree of interest shown by the press and film circles all over the world in the particular festival. This is not identical with size, because occasionally a small festival, if it is, for example, political, creates more interest than its size warrants.

Critics present. I have purposely not given exact figures here, but have instead stuck to the 1-5 grading system in this column, because the grade given is an average of two measurements: the total number of accredited film writers, and the number of serious critics. This explains the apparent inaccuracy to those who are familiar with the number of accredited writers at any one festival. For example, Berlin has more accredited guests than Moscow, but the number of serious critics is higher at the latter, thus both end up in grade 2.

Character. This basic column gives information concerning the type of films shown and the manner of their presentation. I-International. L-Local. F-Features. S-Shorts. C-Competition. Again the X is used for special categories, which are numbered and explained in a footnote to this column.

Critical Atmosphere. This is a different measurement of the fest's importance, this time taking into consideration the general atmosphere of the event. Some festivals, despite a great deal of "play," have a profound importance critically, like for example Venice, whereas at other festivals the social angles tend to predominate.

Side Events. This column indicates the amount of attention given in festival programming and in surrounding scheduling to activities outside of film screenings in and out of competition. High degree of side-events could include discussion forums, projections of TV films, retrospectives of past classics, assemblies of various international film organizations, etc., but this category does not include such side events as parties, receptions, cocktails, galas, etc. Press conferences are included if they are generally of a serious nature and not just star-meets-press.

Political Overtone. Two considerations entered into the calculations for the grades in this column: 1) whether the festival itself is directly political in intent, and 2) whether there is an overtone of political importance to the events. This category specifically does not include an evaluation of the possibility that the prizes may be distributed for political reasons. While the probability of this occurring is naturally greater at festivals with a high grade in this column, I have no actual evidence for such action, and would thus not like to make such an accusation part of this statistical analysis. In general, however, this could be taken as a negative category, because it indicates, in the cases of high-grade festivals, that considerations other than artistic enter into the choice of films.

Anti or Pro—U.S. This is a non-graded category, because the degree of pro or anti US feeling usually changes from jury to jury. I have left out marking these festivals where no clear line exists, and have simply marked with a (—) those where there is a fairly clear anti-U.S. line, and with a (+) those fests which have expressed pro-U.S. feelings. It must be understood that my experience is only that of 1961 and 1962. I have not graded in this column nor in the preceding one) those festivals I have not actually attended. In fact, this whole category is a very ambivalent one, and I add it only because it is a question that keeps being raised in Variety. Basically I do not really believe that there is an a priori anti-American feeling at any festival (I have seen American films win prizes at communist festivals, for example). It is just a matter of a difference of approach, and of an entrenched identification of "USA" with "Hollywood" and with non-artistic film.

Art Part in Choice. This category grades the degree to which festivals pay attention to artistic criteria in the choosing of films for their events. Grading validity limited to films chosen or invited by the fests.

Jury Quality. The grading in this category is partially a function of "size," as the small festivals cannot always afford top juries. Thus I have calculated the gradings as an average between possibility and fact (so that the grading actually becomes more of a measurement of good will). But generally a high grading in this category indicates that the particular festival attempts to have juries of high caliber, so that simultaneously two other characteristics emerge: that artistic criteria are used in choosing films and that a good critical attitude reigns.

New Cinema. Here I measure the degree to which festivals pay attention to new directions in world cinema, and the degree to which they attempt to support seemingly creative movements and/or directors or other film workers. This seems to me to be a major function of festivals, perhaps one of the very basic ones, to serve as information centers for the critics of the world and to assist, through the publicity which they afford, young people everywhere in their attempt to gain an audience for their work.

Business & Prize Chances. The last 4 columns are to be taken with great care. I have tried, by calculating the prizes obtained and the sales effected at festivals over the past two years, to give an approximate guide to the chances that American spectacles and American works of cinema (note distinction) could have at the various festivals. Note that this is a strictly empiric column, based on the past record, and that it should not be construed to represent suggestions or guiding lines for US producers.

General Observation. Film fests marked A in this column I have personally attended, either as jury member or accredited critic. Fests marked K indicate those where I know the organizers personally, and am familiar with the procedure. Lastly I apologize for including, for completion's sake, fests marked N, where my information is obtained via 3rd parties.

TWO KINDS OF FILM FESTIVALS

(1) Spectacles Carry the Burden of Great Costs

(2) Selectives Substitute Theme for Budget

(3) Meanwhile Festivals Undergoing Judgment

By GIDEON BACHMANN

In a small black book carried about by Hans Hoehn, VARIETY's correspondent in Berlin, there is a list of all the film festivals of the world. Last time we met, at Oberhausen in February, he had 80 listings. Since then, I've discovered two more that he didn't have in his collection.

About 600 journalists, film publicists, occasional gossip columnists and celebrity photographers, are counted by the major festivals as the standard corps of "festivaliers"—those drifting hordes of professional peeping toms who yearly do the bit: that is, spend from the beginning of May until the end of September travelling from shindig to shindig, at the cost of the various national organizations in the European countries who put up the dough to finance the fests. Also running: a few film critics, a few radio commentators, a few serious-minded enthusiasts who continue believing that cinema is an art form and that festivals were created to prove this.

After two years of festivaliering, I have come to two major conclusions: first, that this assumption is high-falutin nonsense, and second, that it won't continue to be nonsense forever.

Changing Phenomena

Because if one thing is clear, it's that the nature of film festivals is changing. Though different in origin, most festivals are today run in conjunction and with the financial support of national or local tourist promotion bureaus. But with the economic change of the industry, the world-wide stress on more serious films, independent production, the maturing of audiences, the increasing trend towards art films that make money, and other factors, the festival crowd is no longer identical with tourist groups. The latter go where they go to get away from their professional preoccupations; festivals now attract people who go there to work.

One can no longer simply say "film" and mean moving celluloid of all kinds. Two very clear and separate industries are emerging: the cinema and the spectacle. Festivals have always been, and always will be, commercial affairs, that is, events created to foster and promote the wider distribution of the industrial product "film." Not to realize this, is playing ostrich. But that which must be realized alongside with this basic fact, is that cinema, as juxtaposed to spectacle, is also an industrial product, and that its market is growing.

By "spectacle" I mean all kinds of public arts which are meant solely to entertain.

By "cinema" I mean the exact opposite: those works of film which do not try to take the viewer away from himself, but conversely try to engage him in a certain amount of self-searching—in other words, those works that make you think instead of trying to stop you from doing so.

The mistake that serious film critics (including myself) have committed over the years, is that we have not realized this basic difference, and that we have continuously demanded that the producers of spectacles produce cinema. It may not be a very pleasant comparison, but adequate, if I say that this is like asking a plumber to build a guided missile, just because steel is used. It seems to me that the change in the nature of festivals lies in the realization of the difference.

Two Kinds of Films

I have spent a great deal of time (and space in the columns of VARIETY) analyzing the change that is overtaking audience tastes. In this discussion of festivals, there is no need to go back over all this material, but I want to recall the conclusion of earlier research: the meaningful cinema—the one addressed to a mature audience—is today a better business proposition than the spectacle, for a variety of reasons, of which low initial cost of production is the most important.

One of the major reasons for the high cost of spectacles in relation to their potential income, is the need to constantly keep whipping up artificial appetites in the public, and the resultant publicity expense. Of course, the other kind needs, a sales effort, too, but its ability to get along without expensive sets, star-monster-salaries and Bounty-ful production expenses enables it to make its money back from a smaller audience. Thus it can stake higher-level themes, and in turn attract wider selective crowds. From the vicious circle of the mounting cost and the dwindling public, we get the propitious cycle of the mounting quality and the growing audience.

These facts had become clear in Europe long before they became clear in the U.S., and they are reflected in the changed policies of the major film fests. While Cannes, for example, has always been known as the most business-conscious of festivals, it has now re-oriented itself to artistic guide-lines. While keeping its appeal to businessmen and its validity as a marketplace, it has simultaneously acquired a tinge of art ambiance. In 1962, for example, a special section of the festival presented films chosen by film critics as examples of mature work by young directors, and more and more the big American films like "West Side Story" or "Advise and Consent" have been running out of competition, more as favors to their makers. And the films that have won prizes are the ones most corresponding to the trends described above.

B.O. and Art

Theoretically, of course, fests have always been art-oriented. The first, Venice, started in 1932 as an outgrowth of the bi-annual art exposition, and did not become a "festival" in the accepted sense until years later. It is still officially called "International Exhibition of Cinematographic Art," and in its 24th year (1963) has just adopted new regulations which more strictly than ever impose artistic arbitration on the submitted films.

The problems of organizing a film festival are enormous. Each festival wants films that have not, if possible, been seen elsewhere, and some like the big ones, make this fact a condition of entry. The entrenched habit of inviting guests and paying their stay and upkeep (and often, if they are jury members or otherwise important for the success of the event, also their trip from their home and back), entails great cost. The big festivals employ, year-round, a substantial staff and maintain offices. Cannes and Venice have gone so far as to build palaces for the sole use of the festival—edifices that stand empty during 50 weeks each year. Add to this the cost of the festival itself in administrative outlay, propaganda & publicity, printing, film shipping, pre-selecting and screening, etc etc, and it becomes very clear very quickly why a festival cannot subsist on art alone.

Sale of tickets to the public on festival nights covers a minimal fraction of the expense (most of the audience is deadhead), so that it has always been necessary to find ulterior motives for the operating of film festivals, as no funds would otherwise have been forthcoming from either government or other sources. The negotiations with hotel owners on the Lido at Venice, for example (which have kept the festival from leaving that ugly island and returning to the charm of Venice itself) are a constant bone of contention in the yearly preparations, but they are unavoidable, because Venice still serves, besides film art, to extend the tourist season by at least a week. If you go to the Excelsior hotel on the day after the Festival closes, you will find its doors and windows shuttered, its boat moorings removed and stored away for the winter, the streets of the Lido littered with torn posters.

Or take the problem of finding films. Each country and each producer has their own private motives for having a film seen at a fest. Festival films are usually exempt from tax and import quotas, so often a film is sent because it couldn't get into a country any other way, not because it is especially good. And who decides what is good and bad before festivals? Selection committees are as divided as juries, and take longer to operate, because they must screen more films. The big countries, represented by their national associations, feel it is their right to select their country's choice—a choice often political or ethnical rather than artistic. And finally, the political aspects of these big international meets impose an inevitable non-artistic measuring rod, whether it's an East or a West fest. Festivals like Karlovy Vary and Berlin, who vie for first place in the number of countries represented, often accept trash because it comes from an obscure country. The amount of time I have wasted sitting through public-education features from Vietnam, Liberia, Korea, Hong Kong, Mali, Turkey, etc etc, defies addition.

Steps to improve the national selection of films are being taken now, but time will go by until a modus operandi can be found that will assure the best films from any one country a showing at the major fests. Our own "Stevens Committee," founded in 1961, has improved somewhat the US selections at the 1962 major fests, but even this committee hasn't been able to go far enough afield to include in its selection those obscure, small-budget independent productions, which often turn out to be the sleepers at those fests where the jury is a little more serious and less political than at others.

This year Venice has finally given up its selection committee, and has refused to accept any films unless they meet the specifications of the festival director, except that countries with a production of more than 70 films average per year over the past three years have the right to at least one film entered and chosen by them. And even for these films Venice reserves the right to enter the film in or out of competition. And the Association de la Jeune Critique Internationale (Young Critics International) is in the process of forming permanent critics committees in various countries in order to assist the festivals with suggestions. But whatever the efforts, the fact remains that there are many elements that must be considered in fest operating, not all of them serving the cause of good cinema.

Not To Win

Take the whole question of prizes, for example. Today a bigger element in producers' decisions whether to send a film to a fest or not, is the fear that the film will not win a prize rather than the chance that it will. With the multiplicity of festivals and the paucity of product, almost any film of any caliber can win some kind of prize somewhere. But to have to hear "that's the film that did not make it in Cannes" is beyond the tolerance of many producers.

An important part in the delineation of festival procedures is played by the International Federation of Film Producers' Organizations (FIAPF). It is this organization that decides whether a festival may call itself an "A" fest (first-run pictures in competition), or only a "B" event, which attracts less films, less crowd, usually no stars, and thus less $$. While the system of submission of films by national producers organizations subsists for most festivals, the FIAPF enjoys an enormous influence on the festivals, who must, in the final analysis, bow to its strictures. The fact that the FIAPF is interested solely in the business aspect of film, has long hampered the development of truly artistic criteria by the major festivals, and even today Cannes, Venice and Berlin continue to fight, but in the end (not least through the competition among themselves) submit to the FIAPF's rules.

50 'Serious' Critics?

I would say there are about 50 really conscious, serious film critics in the world today, about five or six each in the U.S., France, Italy, England, and one or two in other film-production countries. It is an incestuous group, rarely enlarged by the advent of a young talent. But what opportunities are offered them by the festivals, to increase their knowledge and understanding and to carry the responsibility they shoulder? Almost none. The essential element of an exchange of views among critics—a discussion tribune—is offered only by four festivals: Moscow, Karlovy Vary, Leipzig, and Mar del Plata. Montreal, Cannes, Edinburgh and Poretta Terme offer other public events of interest, but no major Western festival has yet had the initiative to organize a "Free Tribune" as exciting and polemic as that of the Communist festival at Karlovy Vary, for example. This is a political loss, and an artistic one.

Last year, in Venice, AJCI, the Young Critics group, organized an attempt at a tribune, but the festival did not cooperate, and attendance was small. This year AJCI has been asked by the Berlin Festival to organize a free tribune there, and it is to be hoped that this will set a tradition for all Western festivals. The deadly atmosphere of hotel lobbies, screening rooms and flag-bedecked streets, in which hourly meet people who have seen each other all over the world but who have never exchanged views or as much as greetings, could give way, through these tribunes, to a cordiality and closeness that could extend beyond the duration of the fests and create a closer contact among film writers during the year.

I have devised a "Festival Thermometer" table intended to give U.S. filmmakers, and all other persons interested, basic lowdown on them. It is a comparative study, and subject to alteration and to mistakes of judgment, like all personal views. But it is built on two years of solid festival travel, endless discussions with other critics, conversations undertaken for this purpose with festival directors, and a great deal of bad, and good, experience. Explanations of the categories are included with the chart.

Lightweight Cameras & Recorders Create 'Cinema Truth' Market

By GENE MOSKOWITZ

Paris.

Perfection of lightweight cameras and readily-portable sound gear has created a kind of film which warrants notice in this edition. This phenomenon goes by various designations—"Cinema Truth," "Cinema As a Witness," "Living Camera" and "Free Cinema." All these descriptives imply the camera is on-spot photography, a la documentary. Naturally the influences and contributions of television prowling are to be acknowledged.

But if it is a medium made possible by improved technological devices the results closely related artistically to the flair of the man who uses the devices. His judgment in selecting theme, moment, angle make the point of creativity. Is this a photographer's medium then, or a director's, or a fusion of two skills? In Paris where arguments over cinema methodology are the gist of cocktail talk, the debate rages.

One of the first to make a dent was Jean Rouch, a French ethnologist, who brought back a lot of footage from Africa. He at first made documentaries only but then had Africans acting out little scenes spontaneously. Then he expanded and in "The Human Pyramid" filmed a mixed group of whites and Negroes acting out a little story in which they learned their own attitudes towards racism. Another step was "Summer Chronicle" a series of interviews in which the people were finally made unaware of the camera after hours of dry runs etc.

Rouch coined the "Cinema Truth" tag with these pics. He felt truth could be got at with people allowed to just talk and react to questions, or act out scenes on their own, which would reveal their own characters even if they were not exactly the people they were portraying.

Another Frenchman, Francois Reichenbach, preferred to use a probing spy technique and sometimes film with hidden cameras. In "A Heart As Big As The" he had a young Negro lawyer put into situations or filmed with hidden cameras to give a character portrait of him.

Mario Ruspoli felt the film should be more a witness of things. Thus he took his equipment to poor peasant sections of France or into an insane asylum and allowed them to record discussions, just look at things and make their own comments by what was shown. In Britain the "Free Cinema" movement did the same.

American tv essay-type filmmakers Richard Leacock and Robert Drew, and the team of Albert and David Maysles, were also discovered when the other films got okay art houses airings and plenty of critical comment and some fest awards. Making films for Time-Life TV three of them "Primary," "On the Pool" and "Kenya" were shown as a theatrical program in a local arty for good critical acclaim and fair business.

The Yank teams favored a spontaneous film in recording subjects and thus giving an insight into them. "Primary" showed the campaigning of Senator Kennedy and Senator Humphries for the Democratic presidential nomination and gave a look at the men in their temperament, contacts and speeches.

The Maysles brothers have one called "Showman," on U.S. foreign film buyer and showman Joe E. Levine, that will grace the Critic's Section at the presently unopening Cannes Film Fest.

There have been precursors like Frenchman Georges Rouquier whose "Farrebique" showed the life cycle of a French farm using real people. Rouquier refers to his outlook as "Film Statement." And Chris Marker, also French, contributed his intellectualized but pungent looks at Siberia and Israel. Also there is yet Dutch documentarist Joris Ivens whose cameras looked at all important world events.

The late Robert Flaherty's poetic pix about different peoples also are among those venerated by these kind of filmmakers. Add the Russian Dziga-Vertov who put together direct footage shot on all aspects of Russian life to make a background to this new cycle.

The present spate of compilation films on the Third Reich, the infamous Warsaw Ghetto, the Russian Revolution, the Spanish Revolution, the First World War and others show a new interest in a direct reality put into ordered form to give a viewpoint towards it.

Even the New Wavers have claimed they have tried for achieving this sort of truth in their pix by improvisation, on-the-spot shooting and contemporary subjects. Morris Engels have also pioneered in the U.S. with his "The Little Fugitive" which pre-dated and influenced the Wave.

Almost all the above films have gotten theatrical releases here if somewhat more restricted abroad. But it is drawing new recruits and appears to remain a part of the regular film picture in adding information, comment and insight to the entertainment aspects of the film as a commercial commodity.

Cannes Bags Choice Of Indie 'Les Abysses' As Official French Film

Cannes.

Protest against the French Selection Committee's choice of the indie and first film "Les Abysses" (The Depths) to represent France officially at the Cannes Film Fest, May 9-23, was made by producer Francis Cosne to Michel Peyrre-Carmoezy, head of the governmental Centre Du Cinema, on the eve of the festival's beginning.

This might rate as only sore losing if Cosne were not director of the French Film Producer Assn. Thus he is presumably speaking for all the producers against the taste of the Committee and against the good fortune of an independent who was courageous enough to make this feature on his own and without a distributor.

Nico Papatakis, whose first film this is, went ahead without getting the pre-censor visa via submitting a script to the CDC. However the film was released in two artics here last week and got the regular censor nod and go-ahead.

Film won mild reviews, though there were some dissenters. Jean-Paul Sartre, Simone de Beauvoir, Jean Genet, Francoise Sagan and Andre Le Breton went to bat for it by allowing extensive rave quotes to be used.

It is a harsh but absorbing look at two half-mad servant girls who end up killing their masters. Richard Quine and George Abaroa have invested in the pic and supplied the final coin to Papatakis to wind his pic after seeing a rough cut.

The CDC Selection Committee has sometimes been accused of picking easy star-ridden films to appeal to gala-minded audiences rather than for intensive, specialized competing festivals. Such pix as "Hiroshima Mon Amour" "Breathless" and "Forbidden Games" have been turned down only to go on and reap top awards at other fests.

But Committee was responsible for selecting "The Four Hundred Blows" and "Black Orpheus" in '59, and have always found a place for such 2 difficult filmmakers, commercially, as Robert Bresson.

Two other pix recommended for invite on a competing basis, a satirical, macabre comedy on how to get ahead in business "Carambolages" (Carom), and "Hitler-Connais Pas" (Hitler, Never Heard of Him), were also questioned with the latter finally being replaced by "Le Rat D'Amerique" (American Adventurer).

"Carambolages," directed by Marcel Bluwal, a second pic, thus stays while Bertrand Blier's "Hitler," a series of interviews with French youth to give a particular to general view on the new generation's outlooks, was turned down. Replacement, directed by Jean-Gabriel Albicocco, is about a penniless Frenchman's adventures floating around South America. So Cosne is a bit appeased with a regular pic replacing the interview indie "Hitler." But the main triumph was in keeping in "The Depths."

Selection Committee, under the CDC, is composed of members from among critics, filmmakers and the big walks of films, like producers, themselves, exhibs and distributors.

Cannes Fest Jury

Cannes.

The jury for the 16th Cannes Film Fest, May 9-23, is made up of 11 members with five from France and one each from the U.S., Russia, Italy, West Germany, Great Britain and Spain. They are as follows:

Belgium Gets The Festival Fever

Brussels.

Though it is a beach resort, the Belgian town of Knokke-Le Zoute will house the third annual International Experimental Film Festival from Dec. 26, 1963 to Jan. 2, 1964. It will be organized by the Belgian Film Museum, La Cinematheque Royale, headed by Jacques Ledoux and headquartered in Brussels.

Ledoux also helmed the previous films fests of this type which took place in Brussels. Backed by the state, the fest will accept all films, either shorts or features, made for tv or theatrical release, which by their nature display an attempt to renew or enlarge the modes of filmic expression. They can be amateur or professional films.

Fest is mainly constituted to encourage free and creative research in filmmaking. Two juries, one to select the films, and one to award prizes at the fest, will be selected by the Film Museum.

Mainly conceived for new or practically unknown films in this category, the first jury will still be empowered to also invite films already shown, either at other fests or publicly, provided they still possess originality or are felt not to have gotten their just recognition. All films entered must have been made since the last experimental fest at the Brussels World's Fair of '58.

Any individual or country can submit as many films as it likes for possible entry in either 16m or 35m and in any size screen processes. They can be either sound or silent. The 35m pix must be wedded copies but the 16m films could be sent with images and sound on separate tracks or tape.

For films accepted the makers have to pay an entrance fee of $10 for pix under 60 minutes and $20 for those over. Films have to be in Brussels by Nov. 1, '63 for consideration. Producers pay shipping charges while the fest handles insurance and storage.

Films can also be submitted with an article of intention by the filmmaker if felt it may not be properly understood. One copy of all accepted films must be left with the Film Museum which will have the right to use extracts on tv during the fest as well as five non-commercial, private showings.

Prizes will be in money with $5,600, the Grand Prix De Gevaert, for the top pic, then the Prix Baron Lambert of $2,800, the Prix Bell Telephone of $2,800, the Prix Comte De Launoit of $2,800, the Prix Solvay of $2,800 and $2,800 award by the Belgian TV-Radio for

French Films & Producers Check-List

Paris.

(It should be noted that the French still have a system of highly splintered independent production and distribution entities. Over 300 producers, and as many distribs, do not make it easy to list the year's production in neat array. Herewith are the main companies, which make more than three or four features a year. In most cases, these are coproduced among several French or Common Mart companies).

COCINOR-MARCEAU

Also distributes. Mainly has joined with other producers on product. Did one local exploiter, strictly for home, "C'est Pas Moi, L'Autre" (Not Me, the Other) with local comics. Also "Et Satan Conduit Le Bal" (Satan Calls The Shots) with Hoche and Spéhérone Films, a first pic mainly for exploitation too, "Germinal" on the Zola novel with Elysees, Metzger & Woog and Laetitia Films in Rome, "Le Soupirant" (The Suitor) with CAPAC, a comic find in director-actor Pierre Etaix, and "Le Meurtrier" (The Murderer) another programmer with International Films here, Corona in West Germany and Sancro in Rome.

GAUMONT

Has distrib and exhib arms but mainly makes films in coproduction. Has a Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer backed adjunct, Gaumont-International, which made grosser "La Glaive Et La Balance" (Sword and Balance), with Anthony Perkins, and sex exploiter "Le Vice Et La Virture" of Roger Vadim. Metro has various countries for distrib on former and all markets on latter. Gaumont also did costumer "Le Masque De Fer" (Iron Mask) with Ceres and Marly Films locally and "Jusqu'au Bout Du Monde" (Till End of World) with Caravelle and Ultra Films. Also released cinephonic pic "Arsene Lupin Against Arsene Lupin."

PATHE

A big distrib and exhib, with a production arm, seemed content mainly to distribute and exhib this year with four pix locally. Some money guaranteed but not actual production participation. They were offbeaters "Au Coeur De La Vie" (At Heart of Life) based on three Ambrose Bierce U.S. Civil War stories produced by Franco London, Sinfonia and Centaure, offbeater "La Baie Des Anges" (Angel Bay) produced by Sud Pacifique, costumer-actioner "Mandrin" made by Franco London, Films Gibe and Titanus from Rome, "Le Roi D'Amerique" of Franco London, Madeleine and Zebra and "Tempo Di Roma" of Films Cyclope and DAMA of Rome.

FILMSONOR

Headed by vet producer Georges Lourau, who also has a distrib arm Cinedis. But latter will be absorbed by Gaumont and only Filmsonor will go on. Did and released "The Devil and the Ten Commandments" with Mondex and Procinex and costumer "Scheherazade" with locals Speva, Cine Alliance, DEAR Film in Rome and Tecisa in Madrid.

FRANCO LONDON

Bossed by energetic, canny Henri Deutschmeister was mainly in a coproduction capacity in this year of crisis. Besides aforementioned "Le Roi De L'Amerique," "At Heart of Life" and "Mandrin," did sketch pic "Les Quatres Verites" (Four Truths) with Madeleine, Hispamer in Madrid and Ajace in Rome. Also involved in several skeins for coming second tv web.

ROME-PARIS

Run by Georges De Beauregard in partnership with Carlo Ponti of Italy. Did well with offbeaters such as "Breathless," and this year is winding another pic by Jean-Luc Godard (Breathless) "Les Carbiniers" (The Riflemen) with Cocinor-Marceau and Laetitia of Rome. Did gangster hit "Le Doulos" (The Stoolie) with Champion of Rome and macabre comic hit "Landru" also with Champion of Rome. Joe Levine has taken latter for U.S. Also prepping Brigitte Bardot pic, "Contempt."

CIPRA

Bankrolled by MGM and run by Jacques Bar. MGM gets most distrib territories. This year has Simone Signoret-Stuart Whitman starrer "Today We Live," (called "Le Jour Et L'Heure" (Day and Hour) in France, made partly in English with Cormoran and Terra Film, and CCM-Monica of Rome. Also three Jean Gabin pix with "Le Gentleman D'Epsom" done with Bar's own Cite and CCM, Rome, "Melodie En Sous-Sol" (Cellar Melody) as above and "Un Singe En Hiver" (A Monkey in Winter) as above.

COMACICO

The ex-UFA-Comacico, with distrib and production in Copernic Films. Did "Les Grands Chemins" (Big Roads) with Sopherene and Dear Film in Rome, "Nous Irons a Deauville" (We'll go to Deauville) with Hoche and Odeon, and "Un Chien En Jeu Des Quilles" (Dog in Game) with Electra. Distributes all. Also has big scale "La Fayette" which it will distrib in U.S. with new own film arm Maco Films.

TRANSWORLD

Has deal with Joe Levine's Embassy Films in U.S. Did "Les Jeunes Filles De Bonne Famille" (Girls of Good Families) with Cosmo of Rome involved and Columbia distributing except in U.S. Headed by Gilbert Bokanowski.

PARIS

Robert and Raymond Hakim made two in Italy this year via "Eva," directed by Yank Joseph Losey in English, and "Eclipse" by Italo filmmaker Michelangelo Antonioni. Now back at home base with various projects.

PLEIADE

Indie Pierre Braunberger did the prize-winning "Vivre Sa Vie" (Live Her Life) of Jean-Luc Godard and "Un Coeur Gros Comme Ca" (A Heart as Big as That) by Francois Reichenbach. Also in comedy "Virginie" with Corona and does many shorts.

FRANCOS

Francis Cosne did the big grossing "Le Repos De Guerrier" (Warrior's Rest) with Brigitte Bardot with INCEI, Rome and Columbia has it for the U.S., as well as comedy "Comment Reussir En Amour" (How to Succeed in Love) with France-Cinema and Manole.

MADELEINE

Gilbert De Goldschmidt coproduced previously mentioned "Le Roi De L'Amerique" and "Four Truths."

HOCHE

Ray Ventura participated in already cited "We Will Go To Deauville" and "Satan Calls The Turns."

CICC

Raymond Borderie with war pic "Fort Du Fou" (Mad Fort) with Fono Roma and Films Borderie, and "Du Mouron Pour Les Petits Oiseaux" (Chicken Feed For Little Birds) with Jules Borkon, Films Borderie, Variety Films, Borderie's distrib arm Prodis handled both pix.

EGE

Had two programmers with "Bricoleurs" (Dabblers), with Felix Film, and "L'Abominable Hommes De Douanes" (Unbearable Customs Man) with Felix Films again.

FILMEL

Hit "Therese Desqueroux" with 20th-Fox putting up backing and distributing.

TERRA

Along with Fides, Orsay and Trocadero did the first pic of Serge Bourguignon "Les Dimanches De Ville D'Avray" (Sundays and Cybele). Columbia invested and distributed.

ARGOS

With Alpha and DEAR Film in Rome did Alain Resnais' new offbeater "Muriel." (He did "Last Year in Marienbad" and "Hiroshima Mon Amour"). United Artists put up the nut for world distrib rights except in French speaking countries and Italy.

LUMBROSO

New company by legit impresario Fernand Lumbroso did "Un Jeune Homme Honorable" (An Honorable Young Man) with Ultra film here and Sicilia in Italy. Lumbroso has several other projects.

PARIS EUROPA

Headed by Alexandre and Michel Salkind and did the Orson Welles offbeat "Le Proces" (The Trial) with Hisa of West Germany and FICIT of Rome.

SUD PACIFIQUE

P. E. Decharme, old-timer, now back and throwing in lot with New Wavers. First pic "La Baie Des Anges" (Angel Bay) of Jacques Demy and now shooting "Peau De Banane" (Banana Skin), Marcel Ophuls' (son of late noted director Max) first pic. Both star Jeanne Moreau.

ELEFILM

Comedy by newcomer Michel Deville "A Cause, A Cause D'Une Femme" (Because, Because of a Woman).

UNIVERS

Actioner "Accident" with Felix Films with 20th-Fox backing for distrib rights, and exploiter "Eternite pour Nous" (Eternity For Us).

EDITIONS CINEGRAPHIQUES

Indie Jean Thuillier with Camer Productions has done a sleek thriller "Ballade Pour Un Voyou" (Ballad for a Hoodlum) of Jean-Claude Bonnardot.

CENTAURE

First pic by Robert Enrico "La Belle Vie" (The Good Life) with non-actors.

plus the importance of keeping up prestige.

But others think that a good national film can emerge a good international export item and there should be enough offbeaters for festivals and "art" audiences. Upped aid could also help them ease coproductions and not lose pix to Italy as has happened.

A future ECM fund, filled by admission levies at all houses of France, Germany, Italy and the Benelux countries, is also planned, which means eventual doing away of direct producer aid. But whether future aid will be uniform or geared to each country's problems are still a bone of contention in Brussels.

Then there is French grappling with tv. A second web is due soon and there are over 3,500,000 sets in operation with double expected by 1967. The state tv org, Radiodiffusion-Television Francaise, has also been taking over film studios and making vid series for the new and present web primarily on their own without enough allowances to filmmakers to help them balance problems with this new income.

Television gets its money from set licenses but if it has any deficit it is made up by the government. Films remain essentially private, with all the amortization problems, while still being administered by the state. This puts the French film at a grave disadvantage.

One hope is that new aid will stay constant for a pic as it plays out its three year or reissue career even if aid is lowered during this period.

A recent upsurge of grossers is somewhat heartening. But French filmmakers still are not on solid footing. It boils down to somehow getting a rising curve of attendance which has been falling steadily since the war.

Some hope is also felt in the seeming growing addiction of the young to films.

If the French can get through this period of recession, find an economic offset to tv, see the ECM work out a more concerted and intelligent attitude towards films, there could be a final quieting of the constant "crises."

Committees have been formed to study problems of easing Common M. exchange and coproduction, as well as finding a new classification for films. They have usually been listed under industrial or luxury products. But it is pointed out that each film has its problems of sales and a multimillion dollar film can not be lumped with a small budgeter. Even if there are raised prices for the former they eventually end in subsequents and priced the same.

All these considerations will be taken up at future meetings. The U.S. major inroads into local ECM production by investments may also be looked into. But it is felt that this needed bolstering is causing more production rather than exploiting any local industries.

Whether a final global quota for ECM countries, and more coproductions, will mean less places for Yank pix is just now a matter of conjecture.

IRLING "ROOM AT THE TOP" "A TASTE OF HONEY" "MON ONCLE" "A MAN ESCAPED"

Festival Needs Satiric Elements; Invited Pictures Supplying Them; LeBret Defends Cannes Program

By GENE MOSKOWITZ

Cannes.

Comes the great dawn again. And again talk is heard that France, Italy, its close production partner, and the United States, where Hollywood is still prominent despite the way the craft unions there talk, are dominating the showcase here. There are four Italian features on schedule for Cannes plus three each from France and America. Does this imply a three-way division of the best chances?

Not so, insists fest director Robert Favre Le Bret. Besides, says he, one American film and one of the Italian entries are showing out of competition. To the argument that films of other countries might have also been chosen that way, Lebret answers that a fest needs some lighter fare, mixed with its serious fodder, to give it some balance. Italy is still in its stride and has a witty, mordantly satirical pic, "The Queen Bee," which fits this need and it was thus invited to compete. Last year "Divorce Italian Style" gave the fest a lift. And ditto for the thrills of Alfred Hitchcock's "The Birds" testing off the fest in a non-competitive spot. Le Bret also points to an invited second British pic in spite of Common Market differences. (Note: "The Lord of the Flies" has a British director but Yank and Puerto Rican backing).

No Featherbed Chums

So Lebret insists there is no mutual featherbedding between France and Italy or France and the U.S. And, quotes he, the quality of the films will be the only statement on this issue. If the four, three and three, for Italy, U.S. and France respectively, are not up to fest calibre then he may be queried on this issue.

LeBret also feels that the big producing countries, with many more films, have a chance of making more good ones. And others, in this league, like Japan and Russia, are content to send one while India sent nothing this year. The fest group also decries the [illegible] aspects of fest [illegible] since there are less pix than heretofore with 20 when there are usually 20 to 25.

And then what about Rumania, Cuba and Gabon, Africa in the running with films which were all directed by French? LeBret states he can not help it if filmmakers become more and more like journeymen. All these films have been submitted by the countries in question and thus have to be accepted.

American and French stars appear in an Italian film which has American money in it, and this does not make it any less an Italian film, he avers. The constant internationalization of films may give headaches on pinpointing the true national creative aspects, but the fest can only bow to the countries submitting the films.

And these films are all in their native tongues. After all, winds Lebret, this is an international film festival and there is no reason why a filmmaker can not make a worthy film outside of his own country as writers and painters do without any accusations of any kind. Of course there is the thorn that the latter remain what they were while a film comes under a different nationality.

Be that as it may, the official flag is the thing. And there are 30 nations displaying pix at this coming fest.

Or Was He Too Old

Bruce Jarman of Newhouse newspapers in a guest date on CBS radio last week, spun a story about the latee Mack Sennett who late in life went to Cannes Film Festival. A Frenchman showed him 100 girls in Bikinis; said, "You invented the bathing beauty. How do you like this?

Replied Sennett, according to Jarman: "You have gone to far. It is much more exciting to see the neat ankle of a girl getting on a street car than to see a lot of meat."

Outside-France Take $19,200,000; Excelling 1961

Paris.

According to statistics released by the Centre Du Cinema, repatriated foreign income from French film rentals last year was about $19,200,000, a good $2,000,000 over 1961.

Best customers were still West Germany with $[illegible]—though 9% less than 1961—followed by Belgium and Luxembourg, for $1,[illegible] — 13% less than last year—the USA giving $[illegible]—107% over the preceding year—and Switzerland via $[illegible] or 20% less than previously.

With less films and the various market crises, foreign income fell appreciably in some spots but did go up in Spain by 67%, 60% in Italy, 30% in Canada and 17% in Latin America, in spite of the economic and political crisis in the latter countries.

A former top outlet in Japan fell disastrously by 30% as Japan tv took precedence while Russia dropped 40% and Great Britain 40%. So foreign outlook was fair last year, and a concerted effort to regain dropping returns in many areas will be on this year.

An epic tale of revolutionary Bulgaria.

RUSSIA

"Optimisticheskaya Tragedia" (Official)
(The Optimistic Tragedy)
Directed by Samson Samsonov
With Margarita Volodina, Viatcheslav Tikhonov, Boris Andreev.
Film concerns an episode in the Russian Revolution in which a female commissar brings around a group of sailors. Though it ends in tragedy it is considered optimistic since it was for the Revolution. Pic is an oddity in that it is in 70m, but in black and white.

CUBA

"El Otro Cristobal" (Official)
(The Other Cristobal)
Directed by Armand Gatti
First Cuban pic to be invited to Cannes has been written and directed by a Frenchman with mixed French and Cuban thesps. It is reportedly about the ambivalent outlooks of a character during the early revolutionary days.

POLAND

"Jak Byc Kochana" (Official)
(The Art of Loving) Directed by Wojciech Has
With Barbara Trafbowna, Zbigniew Zybulski, Artur Mlodnicki.
Tale of the wartime reminiscences of a famous actress that have marked her for life.

Poll Swiss Taste Among Teenagers —Yank Spex Win

Zurich.

Swiss teenagers are currently showing a marked preference for American films, notably in the spectacular category. This impression is extracted from a recent poll in and around Zurich among juveniles in the 14-20 age bracket, composed primarily of apprentices, industrial and high school students, but purposely excluding college, university and arts school students whose filmgoing habits are mostly "too sophisticated" to allow for a fair allround picture. Furthermore, since the age of admission in the canton of Zurich is 18 (efforts are presently underway to arrive at an age limit of 16 except for a few specially authorized films), the majority of those questioned were in the 17-18 age bracket. (It's an open secret that adult-looking underage juveniles frequently slip in.)

In all, 26 individual films were mentioned. Topping the list as the most frequently noted title is "West Side Story" (UA), followed by "Ben-Hur" (MGM), "Longest Day" (20th), "El Cid" (Samuel Bronston-AA) and "Absent-Minded Professor" (Disney-BV). Next are "Living Desert" (Disney-BV), German documentary "Dream Road of the World," "Guns of Navarone" (Col) and "Ten Commandments" (Par).

Other U.S. pictures include: "Porgy and Bess" (Col), "Around the World in 80 Days" (UA), "Suddenly Last Summer" (Col), "Jam on a Summer's Day," "Phaedra" (UA), "Summer Place" (WB), "Exodus" (UA) and "Diary of Anne Frank" (20th).

European films are made up of French, German and British product, in that order. Among the latter, such "art" films as "Prisoner," "Orders to Kill," "Taste of Honey" and "A Kind of Loving" figure prominently.

Of the entire list, 16, or almost half, are U.S. pictures. The remainder includes seven French and German films each, five British and one Swiss.

French Talent Did Quite Well At 1962 Fests

Paris.

France did not fare too badly at film festivals last year even if growing emphasis is on commercial product and the boy wonders of recent prominence are themselves going in for exploitable releases.

Francois Truffaut drew a direction nod for his "Jules and Jim" at Mar Del Plata in Argentina. At Cannes oldtimer Robert Bresson came through with a special jury prize for his "The Trial of Joan of Arc." Berlin and Karlovy Vary in Czechoslovakia, passed France by in bestowing laurels.

However at Venice Jean-Luc Godard took a special jury prize for "Live Her Life" and French actress Emmanuelle Riva got the acting nod for "Therese Desqueyroux." At Locarno, Switzerland, the grand prize went to France for Francois Reichenbach's documentary feature "A Heart as Big as That," while at San Sebastian a special word went to still another ex-Waver, Jacques Doniol Valcroze, for "The Denunciation."

Many, and not just Frenchmen, feel Jean Renoir was unfairly sloughed over at Berlin for his witty, zesty and humane "The Elusive Corporal."

53 Taxing Plans in 316 Dutch Towns; Showmen Beg Breaks Versus Video

By HANS SAALTINK

Amsterdam.

In most cities in Holland entertainment tax on cinema continues higher than for theatre, concerts, football. The Nederlandse Bioscoop Bond (Dutch Cinema League) put up a fight for years and in most cases the tax has been reduced to 20%. For cities, however, still levy 25%, and exhibitors can (a) protest or (b) close.

In Amsterdam there is a special clause that on Dutch feature pix only 10% entertainment tax is levied, while documentaries of feature-length can count on a 15% tax. After 1945, when cinema business was booming, the entertainment tax was set at 35%. However, in 1947 cinema attendance already was 10% less than in 1946, and the decline went on from year to year, till it reached a low 71.1% in 1955 (60,000,000 admissions). The next four years attendance went up again (1956: 70,000,000), but from there on a decline set in that has not been stopped by any extensive campaigning. In 1961 only 50,000,000 people went to the cinema, alone or "Together—how nice," as the legendary slogan for going to the movies is.

Every city has its own rule for levying entertainment tax. Six small cities even do not have it at all. But in the remaining 316 cities there are 53 different ways and variations for regulating the entertainment tax. When the City Fathers of Amsterdam granted in September 1962 a reduction of the entertainment tax from 30% to 20% this meant $100,000 annually.

At the end of 1962 the Netherlands Bureau for Statistics published a report about an inquiry (set up in the autumn of 1960) into the cinema-going and television viewing habits of the Dutch public. Though the report appeared late, the conclusions are still valid, with this provision that since 1960 cinema lost 3,000,000 tickets, and more tv sets are in use. In 1960 30% of the Dutch population were in the possession of a television set, and it could be stated that this was one of the reasons for the decline in the cinema attendance. Radio is another victim of television. 90% of the population possesses a radio, however after 7 p.m. only one-third tunes in and listens. Two-thirds of tv set owners watch television, and half of this number watch the screen for more than two hours, which means that one and a half million viewers look at tv at night.

It is clear that these people won't go to the cinema. The Dutch Cinema League has pleaded with the Government to abolish entertainment tax all together, arguing that television receives financial and moral support out of all proportions. No tax is imposed on television but for the standard license fee of $7.30 annually, paid by the viewer.

Boxoffice hits have been few in the past year. Name "Guns Of Navarone" (Col), "El Cid" (Bronston-Meteor), "West Side Story" (UA), "Boccaccio '70" (Levine-Meteor), and "The Longest Day" (20th-Fox). It is clear from the titles that it is specially the one performance per evening films that are able to pull the people into cinemas. "El Cid" up to now has been doing so well that the distributor's share is $250,000. "Boccaccio '70" gathered $80,000 distributor's share in the five opening situations.

One exception on the rule of big investments—big revenue, was the clicking of "La Belle Americaine," small-budgeted French comedy by Robert Dhery that was shown at the Calypso Theatre in Amsterdam for 22 weeks, and during the summer run with Dutch and English subtitles to pull in the tourists as well.

Dutch Films 1962

Three Dutch feature films were released during 1962. Two of them were artistic flops. Kees Brusse's "Fundair In The Rain" (Kermis In De Regen) lacked a good coherent script and suffered under an inadequate sound track. "Rififi In Amsterdam" was the Dutch debut of John Korporaal, who in Mexico made a satirical film "El Brazo Fuerte." "Rififi In Amsterdam" (Nederlandse Filmproductie Maatschappij) suffered from an uneven script (also written by Korporaal) and acting, and an explanation for the concessions made in this film is that the director was desperate to please his producer, who after all had given him a chance to return home. Korporaal probably will direct the next production of the N.F.M., a thriller in which Linda Christian is supposed to star. A third film, produced by Rudi Meyer, "De Overval" (The Raid) was directed by Paul Rotha, who took over the directional stint when Bert Haanstra decided he wanted to make a feature length documentary on the face and behaviour of the Dutchman unobserved. "De Overval" had its world premiere at the Tuschinski Theatre on Dec. 20.

For 1963 several productions are prepared. "Fietsen Naar De Maan" (Bicycling To The Moon) will be ready next spring, but has no theatre as yet. Kees Brusse may be making another film, about life in an apartment building. "Fons Rademakers' film "The Room Of Damocles" will be released in February. After making two films with the N.F.M. Rademakers decided he wanted complete freedom, and sought and found a backer in Alfred Heineken who set up Cineurop. The film was made on a $200,000 budget (average for a Dutch feature film is $140,000), with Raoul Coutard as cameraman. Much is expected of this film and Paul Kijzer, who by way of his Meteor Films, will distribute the film in Holland, but also handles foreign sales, is backing the film with an extensive publicity campaign of $30,000.

'Depths' Wins Prize As Top French Pic

Paris.

The Academy of Cinema, made up of pix critics and film people, awarded its Crystal Stars this week. Best French film was a first effort by Nico Papatakis, "Les Abysses" (The Depths), which will also be the official French film at the Cannes Film Fest, May 9-23.

Best foreign pic named was the Italo "Banditi A Orgosolo" of Vittorio De Seta. Best thesps were Anna Karina in the French pic, "Live Her Life," and Romy Schneider in Orson Welles' "The Trial," plus Serge Reggiani in the French gangster film, "Le Doulos" (The Stoolie).

CAESAR FILM

Newly formed company, headed by Paul Kijzer, up to now distributor (Meteor). Kijzer tried his hand at production, together with Piet Meerburg, back in 1948 with Edmond T. Greville's "But Not In Vain." Initial production of Caesar Film is a co-production with Ulysse Productions (Pierre Roustang and Jean de Baroncelli) in Paris: "The Nicest Frauds In The World" (Les Plus Belles Escroqueries Du Monde), five sketches directed by Chabrol, Godard, Truffaut and Gregoretti. Dutch part of the film is a sketch, set in Amsterdam, "The Diamond Necklace," written and directed by Roman Polanski, with in the lead a new actress, Nicole Karen, a Godard find. Caesar Film also will film Alden Hatch's biography of Prince Bernard. Paul Kijzer, who handles the world rights of Fons Rademakers' picture "Dark Room Of Damocles," may co-produce Polanski's next feature film, "Si Katelbach Arrive" (If Katelbach Arrives). Main attitude of Caesar Film production is to find stories that can break even on the home market but have an angle for the world market to start with.

CINEUROPE

Newly formed company, financed by Dutch beer baron A. ("Freddy") Heineken, hit it off with Fons Rademakers' production of "Dark Room Of Damocles," Dutch entry at the Cannes Film festival. For same company Rademakers is now writing a satirical comedy, as yet untitled, to be produced at the end of 1963.

CITY FILM

Director Gerar Rutten is preparing a documentary about the late Queen Wilhelmina, "Mother Of The Fatherland." Rutten was Queen Wilhelmina's personal secretary during war years in London, and wrote the book "Meetings with Queen Wilhelmina." After the war he resumed his director career, with three Dutch films, last of which was released in 1957. He also will film original story, "The Magician" (Magico) about a magician, stranded on top of a roof with some children during the big flood of 1953, who would be played by Curd Yurgens. This is an Austrian production for Vienna Films (Otto Duerer).

FILMTRUST

Hans S. Beckman's latest production, "Clabe The Rat," directed by German Wolfgang Staudte, copped a Venice film fest Lion, back in 1956. He now is preparing "Salt In The Blood," which he wants to film in Cinemascope and colour. A foreign director will be assigned.

BERT HAANSTRA

Discovering the possibilities of the candid camera when he made his short "Zoo," Bert Haanstra now is filming a feature length documentary on the behavior of the Dutchman, unobserved except for the hidden camera. Named "Jan En Alleman" (John and Everybody), a slight story line to hold the material together (Haanstra is shooting one on 20) is written by film critic and writer Jan Blokker.

NEDERLANDSE

The NFM started in 1960 with two Rademakers pictures, released in 1960 and 1961. Last year John Korporaal directed "Rififi In Amsterdam" that was not a great artistic success, but at least broke even. May 15, 1963 Korporaal starts a new film, subject and cast of which are kept secret. A project of the NFM to make a film with Dutch-born Linda Christian is now called off. NFM also produces documentaries.

SAPPHIRE

Thorough-going company, headed by Rudy Meyer. Produced Haanstra's financial success "Fanfare" in 1958, two years later "The Case M.P.", also by Haanstra. Its recent "Resistance" (De Overval), directed by Paul Rotha, was a great financial success, and Rudy Meyer plans to sit back to see the revenue of this pic flow in, before starting a new production.

VICTORIA

Is planning a co-production with the Soviet Union, depicting the rebellion of Georgians on the island of Texel, north of Holland, against the Germans in 1945. Script is now in Moscow awaiting approval. Director, technicians and cast will be Russian, with Dutch assistance (and part financing) and lab work.

ADMISSIONS FALLOFF

Holland Exhibs Use Decline To Rap Ticket Tax

Amsterdam.

The Annual Report of the Dutch Cinema League (Nederlandse Bioscoop-Bond) is written in gloom, because despite publicity campaigns to turn the tide, cinema admissions went down again, from 50,000,000 to 47,075,000, meaning a decline of 6% in one year.

From 1946 on, the state of film attendance has been a constant point of worry. In the peak year 1956, when 80,940,000 people went to the cinema, the number was still only 78.8% of that in 1946. Since then the decline has continued, and exhibitors see only one way out to stay in the black, that is complete abolishment of the entertainment tax, that last year took about 20% of their gross income.

Gross intake at the box office in 1962 was $30,000,000, which can be broken up in 20% entertainment and purchase tax, 30% film and newsreel rent, and 50% share exhibitors.

West Berlin's Film Companies

By HANS HOEHN

Berlin.

By count 21 feature films were made in W-Berlin in 1962—as compared with 30 in 1961. Of the 21, 14 were shot in the CCC studios at Berlin-Spandau, five in UFA's Tempelhof studios and two in the Arca studios out at Pichelsberg. But despite the decline, W-Berlin kept its position (with nearly 20% of the total W-German film output) as this country's leading production centre. Munich saw the making of 12 (13 in 1961) German films and Hamburg the production of five (nine in 1961) domestic pix in 1962. No films were made in Wiesbaden and Goettingen last year.

West Berlin has still around 20 film producing companies but only few can be called "really active enterprises." Most of the outfits show a wait-and-see attitude. Some, in fact, seem to be more dead than alive.

Here's a lineup of production companies:

AAR

A tiny outfit headed by Fritz Genschow. The AAR emblem appears in the local trade press. The ad offers coproductions. For more info on Genschow, see under Fritz Genschow.

AERO

Productionwise, this company founded by Raphael Nussbaum in 1950, is not too active. Last year, it came along with an excellent full-length documentary, "From Czar to Stalin." It has a coproduction (with Inter-Film, Vienna) on its list: "Der Unsichtbare" (The Invisible). Aero has branched out into the distributing field. Its current distribution offer consists of eight films including Italy's "Kapo," Yugoslavia's "Lady Macbeth" and American releases such as "Asphalt Jungle" and "The Last Hunt."

ALFA

A daughter company of Artur Brauner's CCC set up in 1956. While Brauner's CCC takes care of the sizeable big films, ALFA concentrates on the smaller ones. For further info on Artur Brauner, see under CCC.

ARCA

Within the years 1955-1960, Arca was one of the most active film producing outfits in the land. The dilemma of "Bombs of Monte Carlo," Arca's coproduction with the French Vox whose production costs run up to 3,500,000 D-Marks (after various troubles), brought Gero Wecker, the Arca chief, in a poor position. He joined forces with Hans Oppenheimer and seemingly recovered. Arca has turned out a number of films within the last months. We now have to distinguish two Arca companies: Arca Filmproduktion and Arca-Winston-Film Corporation. The former (with Oppenheimer) made such pix as "Davon traeumen alle Maedchen" (All Girls Dream Of That) and "So toll wie damals dammal" (So Mad Like Once), the latter (w/o Oppenheimer) produced films like "Das Maedchen und der Staatsanwalt" (The Girl and the Prosecutor) and "Liebling—ich wuensche Dich zurueck" (Darling, I Have to Shoot You). Last pix: "Perlen vor aller" (Holidays Like Never Before; Arca Filmproduktion) and "Die weisse Spinne" (The White Spider; Arca-Winston).

BERCOLINA

The original Berolina Film was founded in 1948 by Kurt Schaub and Kurt Ulrich. The death of Schaub (1957) split the company. Ulrich went on his own and named his company Kurt-Ulrich Produktion. Erika Schaub, widow of Schaub, continued under the Berolina banner. But she eventually gave up the making of Berolina pix. Berolina-Film still exists but under its emblem appears now again the name of Kurt Ulrich. For further info on Ulrich, see Kurt-Ulrich-Produktion.

CCC CENTRAL CINEMA

Artur Brauner, the head of CCC, may easily be acclaimed as the most prominent film producer of postwar Germany. And all through the years, he has been the busiest. The times, however, when he (via his CCC and Alfa) turned out 20 and more features per annum seem to be over. He has considerably cut down his production schedule. Will continue doing big things in collab with foreign partners and, incidentally, launched a so-called "risky wave" (sort of a "new German wave"), small-budgeted pix directed, played and authored by newcomers. Teed off with "Robinson 59" and "Mensch und Bestie" (Man and Beast). It's said that the number of Brauner pix won't be more than five or six this year. But, nevertheless, Brauner, definitely one of the most dynamic forces in the German industry, will remain very much active: He has long branched out into the tv field and his CCC studios (seven stages) are constantly rented to most (notably tv) units.

EICHBERG

Big trade emblem is still a common sight in the local trade press. Company is still alive (the old stalwart Eichberg passed away several years ago) if only on a limited basis. One of its last efforts was "Im Namen des Teufels" (In the Name of the Devil) made in collab with Bavaria.

FONO

Headed by Dr. Hermann Schwerin, this company comes along with at best one pix per year. Fono's latest was "Das Feuerschiff" (The Light-Ship) which Ladislao Vajda directed. Schwerin himself is very active in the industry. He's manager of a Munich-based German film group (Constellation) which has deals with Columbia. The latter, incidentally, is distributor of his "Light-Ship."

GENSCHOW

Actor-director-producer Fritz Genschow has become known as Berlin's most prominent "children's uncle," especially via his "Uncle Tobias" RIAS (radio) series. He also fairy-tales for the screen and stage. Still does stage productions but his last fairy-tale film dates back quite a few years now. Nothing heard of HD-Film for quite some time. But its founder, Hans Deppe, vet actor and director, keeps himself busy with directing pix for home consumption.

INTER WEST

This producing outfit hasn't turned out a film in several years. But no financial dilemma for Wenzel Lucdescher. He's the boss of Berliner Synchron, one of the most active dubbing companies in the land.

KURT ULRICH

Next to Brauner, the most popular producer in town. And for many years, also one of the most active filmmakers in the Reich. His last productions included "Mein bester Freund" (His Best Friend) which Leo Trenker directed and remakes of "Gipsy Baron," "Kohlhiesel's Tochter" (Kohlhiesel's Daughters) and the much talked-about "Three Penny Opera" whose world rights have been acquired by Joe Levine's Embassy Pictures. Ulrich now shows a wait-and-see attitude. Film production has become too speculative a business. His press chief, Gunter Regnen, told this chronicler: "Ulrich has no projects for the moment. The German film situation is too poor at present. We want to have Italian film conditions."

MELODIE

Also this company, headed by Peter Schoettler and Aldo von Pinelli, shows a wait-and-see attitude. No film projects at present. Both Schoettler and Pinelli have no worries. They are intimately connected with the best brands within the German showbiz, the music branch. Schoettler is faring extremely well with his music publishing companies and, in fact, rates as one of the most successful music publishers in Germany.

MORGEN ART

Headed by Hannjoergen Pohland, this young outfit is quite an ambitious one. It plans the filmization of the Guenter Grass novel, "Katze und Maus" (Cat and Mouse), which should be heavy meat for the customers. Company's initial feature, "Brot der fruehen Jahre" (Bread of Former Years), Germany's entry at the 1962 Cannes festival, proved a considerable flop.

MOSAIK-TV

This company deserves mention for it aims at widely branching out into the production field. It has a studio of its own out at Ruhleben (Mars-Film) and a number of vidpix in its credit. The firm is headed by Manfred Scharfenberg, the son of the recently deceased founder-owner of the huge Mosaik (dubbing and printing) laboratories, Ernst Wolff.

OPPENHEIMER

Hans Oppenheimer is one of the city's busiest producers at present. He has turned out several pix of his own or in collab with Arca within the past two years. His current production, "Verspaetung in Marienborn" (Delay At Marienborn), is of unique calibre: It'll be given its world preem on W-German tv prior to its theatrical release. The German tv paid the mammoth amount of $200,000 for this privilege. It's made as an American film: Done in English and later dubbed into German. Cast is mainly American (Jens Ferrer, Sean Flynn) and the crew chiefly French. Directed by German Rolf Haedrich, film is eagerly awaited. The interesting plot is based on actual happenings: Centers on an East German who tries to flee via the Berlin-Frankfurt U.S. military train but is discovered by Soviet control organs.

PETER GOLDBAUM

Just one pic a year. His last was "Heute kuendigt mir meine Frau" (My Husband Is Giving Me Notice Today) which Goldbaum produced and directed. Nothing special.

RIALTO

Here's a switch. A company that—to the surprise of everyone in the domestic film industry—produces nothing but big-money-spelling pix. Fares extremely well (if not sensational) with filmizations of Edgar Wallace crime novels. "Der Zinker" (The Squealer) was Rialto's 12th Wallace filmization. "Der schweigende Abt" will be the 13th. Company is producer of "Der Schatz im Silbersee" (The Treasure of Silver Lake), the first big-scale (C'Scope, Eastman-color) western, one of the surprise hits of the season. The stout b.o. success of "Silver Lake" has encouraged Rialto to plan more big westerns. Shooting of the next German western starts in April in Zagreb. It'll be a filmization of Karl May's trilogy "Winnetou." The two associates of the Berlin-based Rialto-Film are Preben Philipsen and Horst Wendlandt. Philipsen, a Dane, has his own Rialto outfit in his native Copenhagen. Rialto is more or less the only producing enterprise that didn't suffer from the notorious German film dilemma at all, it's said.

UFA

Stopped producing theatrical films two years ago. But otherwise a highly active and healthy enterprise: See separate story.

ULTRA

No feature pix in quite some time. But what goes for Inter West applies to Ultra: Company is kept busy with dubbing foreign films into German. It's one of the most active dubbing outfits in Germany.

WILL TREMPER

Will Tremper established his own company to produce and direct "Die laengste Nacht" (The Longest Night) which will be released soon. It's his second directorial effort. Two years ago, he made "Flucht nach Berlin" (Escape to Berlin). Tremper is sort of a "new waver" among the German filmites.

Podherzer's Imports

Munic Podherzer's Casino Films, which distributes German pix to theatres catering to German-speaking audiences in the United States, will handle 40 new releases in the 1963-64 season.

In addition to heading Casino, Podherzer is U.S. rep for Heinz Deutschmeister's Franco London Films.

Explains Curt Jurgens: 'Germans Saw Too Much Of Me, Hence My Slump'

Berlin.

Curd Juergens (Curt Jurgens) has remarkably lost popularity with the German public. Some years back he belonged to this country's most popular filmstars and temporarily at least held the absolute top position, the German Barometer (a regular survey among exhibitors) now has him in the "also-ran" category.

"I believe," said Jurgens, "my popularity decline in this country has to do with the fact that the German public has seen me just too often on the screen. I think too much exposure hurts the popularity of a filmstar."

Jurgens, in fact, can be regarded as the most active German filmstar of the last two and a half decades. Within this period, he has appeared in "something like 120 to 125 pictures" (he has long lost count over the exact figures.) But he hardly films in Germany any longer. The last years saw him more in French and American features.

Germans May Produce Only 40 Films

U.S. Distributors Can Expect $26,000,000 Take-Home Rentals for '62 From West Germany

By HAZEL GUILD

Frankfurt.

While it's anybody's guess as to what's going to happen with all the perplexing film problems besetting West Germany, it's a pretty fair estimate now that the American distributors will take home about $26,000,000 for their share of the boxoffice receipts for 1962.

Current estimate is that the total gross boxoffice receipts in West Germany will be around $170,000,000 when all the figures are compared for '62. Take off the country's entertainment taxes, notch out the exhibitors' share, and it's expected that the final figure for all the film distributors will total around $65,000,000.

Of that, the Americans will make off with about 40%—or $26,000,000.

Boxoffice business is going down steadily in West Germany, with the 1962 attendance figures down from 10 to 12% over the previous year—and the boxoffice totals down about 8%. (Reason for that apparent clash of figures is that the theatre ticket prices were lifted in 1962, and also some of the annoying entertainment taxes were reduced).

That compares rather unfavorably with 1961, when the over-all picture reflected $190,000,000 total Gross take for the box offices, with $72,000,000 being turned over to the exhibitors. That year the Americans earned about $34,000,000—and the German exhibitors took $23,000,000.

The change, of course, is in the Americans' favor right now. With finances so bad at home that it's almost impossible to raise the loot to finance a new film, the West Germans will be lucky if they come up with 40 new films for the 1963-64 calendar.

Meanwhile, the Americans have increased their portion of the earnings from about 30% of the boxoffice total in 1961 to 40% of the total exhibitors' take in 1962.

All of which looks good on paper.

EVIDENCE OF REVITALIZATION; MUNICH PRODUCERS BUSILY 'PLOT'

By JOHN KAFKA

Munich.

As compared with the preceding year, the number of active filmmakers has almost tripled. Shooting space in Munich can be secured only by booking long in advance. Release companies show increase in volume. As for the film houses, at least their recent progressive shrinkage has been brought to a standstill. Reduced cries of lament are heard from the boxoffices.

The theatrical improvement is due not only to some U.S. blockbusters like "West Side Story," "Longest Day," "Barrabas," and right now "Lawrence of Arabia." Some German releases turned out to be sleepers: one may cite the super-travelogues "Flying Clipper" (MCS) and Dammich's "Dream Roads of the World," also that Teutonic pseudo-western, "Winnetou," also neatly done semi-sophisticated "erotic-comedies" as (a) "The Black-White-Red Fourposter," (b) "Confessions of a Sub-lieutenant" (sold in the States by Continental), and (c) currently "Love Is A Matter Of Learning."

Though certainly needed, there was no expansion of available floor space in Munich or studio-owned exterior areas. Even Europe's second-largest plant, the Bavaria colossus in Geiselgasteig, and its runner-up, Riva-Unterfoehring have posted the "Sold Out" sign for long stretches of time.

It is still television which makes life hard for film producers in search of space but there are also instances of a reverse tendency. Video-outfit "Intertel" recently found all facilities booked at its own homebase, Riva, as well as in all other plants of town, and had to go to Hamburg on "International Showtime."

The problems of the German film industry are partly related to reactions of the Bonn government to not-forgotten experiences. Financing is now marked by extreme care. The day of the easy credit is over, buried under the negatives that never returned their costs of production.

State Film Tax

At this time, there is the so-called Martin Bill before the West-German parliament. It foresees part-financing for "deserving" projects from a pool fed by a percentage of state film tax. The idea of putting money from the box-office end of the cycle back into circulation at the first pre-production stage, borrowed from France and elsewhere, is sound and reasonable but as always some details present stumbling blocks. Producers put a wary eye on the word "deserving" in the bill, fearing a sort of governmental sneak censorship before it comes to meting out funds.

Theatre owners resent potential additional accounting chores imposed on them by the tasks of calculating the tax division and remitting percentages to different offices. They are the least interested in furthering native production, as they, or so they say, could live well and happily on U.S. pictures alone.

Wolf Schwarz, head of NFD, has two features planning. Conrad Von Mola and Fritz Lang are plotting one. Henry Sokal is intent upon "The Genius and The Goddess." Rolf Thiele and Alfred Jacob ready "Leda and The Swan," dream of Kim Novak for the lead. Other productions pending are under the pennants of such showmen as Claus Hardt-Utz Utermann, Hans Dommick, Franz Seitz, Peter Bamberger, Gottfried Reinhardt, Rudolf K [illegible]wicz, Ernst Neubach, Peter Goldbaum, George Witt, Alexander Grueter. These names and their productions hint at the scope of Munich.

'International'

Recognition must be given to those features which are merely packaged in Munich but will be co-produced in some other land—Italy, Greece, France or wherever. Here, as elsewhere the key word is "international."

One hears of deals involving Thailand and Brazil. Always it is necessary to retain some perspective. Not all "announced" undertakings are finally launched.

Munich suffers, as other film producing centers world around, from the difficulty of obtaining "first money," that real-risk capital which may or may not be repaid since there is nothing in existence to serve as collateral. It is this "first money" that the Bonn government is expected to put up.

It is to be remarked that distributor Gloria Films got rid of its Divina-Baldham studios. These are now humming with motion picture and tv activities balancing each other. Munich's remaining studios, Arri (Arnold & Richter), Aventia, Siegert, Teleater-Tellbeck (the former "Carlton"), and in nearby Inning, Schongar and Ammersee harbor the two media maintain equal ratio.

In the distribution line, the crash of Hamburg's Europa has left the local "Big Three," Bavaria, Constantin, Gloria, all but dominating the entire West-German market. However, another active and ambitious outfit, Nora, might join top brackets before long, and Schorcht, a recently revived oldtimer in the release business is already making great strides in approaching the same goal. Minor but competent outfits like Atlas, Pallas, Astoria, and New Film Alliance also contribute to the all-round impression of "big doings" in this particular field.

On top of it, Columbia is moving its Central-European headquarters from Frankfurt to Munich, a great event not merely in the releasing branch of motion picture business. Main reason for the switch was that this American company desires to stay closer to the place of its forthcoming production activities.

Eight independent producers on the receiving end of Columbia's, or rather Constellation's (the local reel organization's), production assignments are reaping the benefit no less than a number of others who were sparked by the inclusion.

Against House Closings: 30 New Film Theatres Open in West Germany

Frankfurt.

Everyone talks about the film theatres folding, but nobody hears about the new houses that keep opening up. In West Germany during 1962, latest figures show, 10 new cinemas started in business, and about 20 were re-opened or completely rebuilt.

With the growing industrialization of the country, the population has taken a turn out of the big cities and into housing developments in the suburbs. Small houses have opened up on the outskirts of the big towns, catering to the local crowd. (There is even one reported case of a scheduled supermarket being switched into a theater!)

Too houses that had been bombed out or closed were re-opened in some of the new growth areas. Actually it worked out that one new house was opened for about every ten that closed down during the year.

Year's end, though, saw the count down to about 6,400 houses—which meant that even with the newcomers to the theater business, the total for West Germany including West Berlin was down about 300 from the end of 1961.

In Frankfurt, for instance, the city wound up with 65 cinemas in 1962, down from the 74 that existed here in 1961. The average local citizen went 15 times yearly to the cinemas.

German View: Much Italo Gore

Wiesbaden.

Most "bloodthirsty" films being made anywhere in the world today—and hence the product likeliest to be snipped up by the censors—are the current crop of Italian pictures, the German censors find.

"The Italians are making quite a few historical pictures based on the Middle Ages, and they tend to be rather gory," noted Dr. Ernst Krueger, head of the German Film Self-Censorship Board which is headquartered here.

Krueger, who in March of this year marked up his 65th birthday and his 30th year in the film industry, is one of Europe's top experts on "what the public cannot be allowed to see." In the early post-war years in West Germany, Krueger noted, it was the American and French films that came in for the most cuts in Germany. Westerns and gangster yarns that the Americans were then turning out were often grim and bloody, and many brutal scenes had to be eliminated in order to meet the German censors' code.

Later French films nude and torrid love sequences were the likeliest to be cut out. "But that has changed very much today," Krueger commented. "The American films give us less to cut. Even the murder mysterious and westerns are milder than they used to be."

The French pics, he added, are sometimes made in two versions, so that the home market may view the violent love scenes, and a more tepid version be offered in Germany.

Germans 9th In Film-Going

Frankfurt.

The West Germans rate only as number ninth among the film-goingest folk of the world. Here's the way the 1962 studies see them:

COUNTRY	Average person goes

Russia	18.3 " "
Israel	17.9 " "
Italy	15.2 " "
Yugoslavia	14.3 " "

Holland	4.4 " "
Portugal	2.8 " "

GERMANS SENSATIONALIZE TITLES

Berlin.

It's often been said that there's nothing to beat the Americans when it comes to sensationalism. Certainly the Germans tend to regard Americans as sensation-minded people. If one glances over the "Germanized" titles of American films, one must change this opinion. The Germans more than hold their own. Here are some examples:

U.S. Original Title	German Title
"Look In Any Window"	"Im Taumel de Sinne" (Ecstasy of Senses)
"Too Soon to Love"	"Die Suende lockt" (The Sin Is Alluring)
"Dark Victory"	"Opfer einer grossen Liebe" (Victim of a Big Love)
"Susan Slade"	"Nur eine einzige Nacht" (Just One Night)
"His Kind of Woman"	"Ein Satansweib" (A Satan's Woman)
"Party Girl"	"Das Maedchen aus der Unterwelt" (The Girl From the Underworld)
"Lover Come Back"	"Ein Pyjama fuer zwei" (A Pair of Pajamas For Two)
"September Affair"	"Liebesrausch auf Capri" (Love Intoxication on Capri)
"Cape Fear"	"Ein Koeder fuer die Bestie" (Decoy For the Beast)
"Requiem for a Heavyweight"	"Die Faust im Gesicht" (The Fist in the Face)
"House of Women"	"Revolte in Block A" (Revolt in Bloc A)
"All Fall Down"	"Mein Bruder—ein Lump" (My Brother—a Jerk)
"The Hustler"	"Haie der Grosstadt" (Sharks of the Big City)
"Escapement"	"Mit 1000 Volt in den Tod" (With 1,000 Volt Into Death)
"Pretty Boy Floyd"	"Der Killer mit dem Babygesicht" (The Killer With the Babyface)
"New Orleans After Dark"	"Der Tod Tanzt keinen Dixieland" (Death doesn't Dance Dixieland)

Sometimes the original title was kept but rarely without "appendix." Per these examples:

"Doctor No"	"James Bond—007 jagt Dr. No" (James Bond—007 chases Dr. No)
"Beachhead"	"Brueckenkopf X" (Beachhead X)
"The Lion"	"Patricia und de Loewe" (Patricia and the Lion)
"The Window"	"Das unheimliche Fenster" (The Mysterious Window)
"Red River"	"Panik am roten Fluss" (Panic On Red River)
"San Antonio"	"Der Cowboy von San Antonio" (The cowboy of San Antonio)
"Ivanhoe"	"Ivanhoe, der schwarze Ritter" (Ivanhoe, the Black Knight)
"Hey, Let's Twist"	"Twist . . . dass die Roecke fliegen" (Twist . . . until the Skirts are flying)

Alfred Weidenmann Sees 'Co-Production' Perfect Solution for Germany

By HANS HOEHN

Berlin.

German filmmaking was down-beat in 1962, both commercially and artistically. Four years ago, the annual W-German output amounted to more than 100 films, down to 78 in 1961, and last year further down to only 64 features. The question forces attention: What's wrong with the German film?

"It's becoming more and more difficult to make films in Germany," according to Alfred Weidenmann, one of this country's better known directors and twice winner ("Canaris" and "Alibi") of the German Federal Film Prize. The difficulties are manifold. Production costs are constantly increasing. Efforts to economize damage quality. To make a film without expensive stars, requires an extraordinarily good story. Good stories, however, are very scarce."

Weidenmann doesn't belong to those who condemn the German film. "It's not only the film that went down in this country. Actually all art branches here register an artistical vacuum at present. Take the musical field: There's practically only one important new name, that's the composer Hans Werner Henze. Take the new German literature: one or two names, Heinrich Boell and Guenter Grass, that's about all. Postwar Germany suffers much from the decentralization. Formerly German art and culture concentrated in Berlin."

Weidenmann had a big success (both with the domestic press and public) with the Lilli Palmer starrer, "Julia, Du bist zauberhaft" (Julia, You're Wonderful), last year. But this was an Austrian-French coproduction. The experience prompted him to say this: "I think that coproductions are now the thing. They reduce the commercial risk, and that, for a German producer, is of vital importance.

Weidenmann has four film projects on his agenda—all are coproduction deals. And Lilli Palmer, the star of his "Julia" film and whom he regards as "the most intelligent actress the German film has currently at its disposal".

Argues Case That Germany's Press Hurts Film Trade

Frankfurt.

The news-hungry and headline-happy West German newspapers must share the blame for the decline and slow fade of the German film industry, one insider here believes. These journals are ever-eager to write something "sensational," without checking as to whether it's completely, partially or not at all accurate, claims a European-born film exec who is now a business leader in America.

"German papers are more unreliable than the American papers are," he commented. Exec asked that his name not be mentioned.

"If every time a German reader picks up a paper, he reads 'German films are no good,' and 'German film industry is dying,' he comes to believe it. And he stops going to the theatre to find out for himself if it's true," he added.

Germany with 50,000,000 has less than one-third the number of people of the United States. Hence, the influence of "national" papers, like the top tabloid "Bild" is immense. This national daily prints about 3,500,000 copies. And by constantly moaning over the fate of the "lost local German film industry," it has contributed to the downfall of films in this country, according to this theory. So have the other major papers.

The smaller the country, the easier it is for the press to influence the readers, the source argued. Once it is reported that several film companies have folded, the public gets worried, the banks refuse credit, folks stay away from the theatres and watch the oldies that turn up on the video screens.

And even when an excellent local film comes along, it is "habitual" to knock it. A German-made pic has to come up against the snob appeal of the "made in America" or "produced in Italy" label.

UFA Very Much Alive

No Longer Produces Feature Films But Runs Rental Studios, Theatres; Operates Newsreel, Active In Export

Berlin.

The (former Reich-owned) Universum-Film Aktiengesellschaft, known as UFA throughout the world, isn't dead as many (abroad) may think. It stopped making feature films two years ago, but otherwise it's still very much alive. With 1,354 people on the payroll of its various branches, it remains the biggest film enterprise in West Germany.

The UFA—newly founded in 1956—has studios still (seven stages) at Berlin-Tempelhof which are constantly rented to outside (mostly tv) companies.

It has still a lineup of cinemas: In all, 33 first-run houses scattered all over Germany in addition to three "Aki" (newsreel) theatres. It used to have over 50 cinemas a few years ago but unloaded the second-run category.

There's also still the UFA newsreel company which, however, isn't UFA's sole property. UFA holds 40% of the shares, the Federal government 20% while two bank houses have 13% each.

There's the UFA-International which, headquartered in Munich, may be rated one of the republic's most successful export organizations. It operates successfully in South America and Japan.

There is the UFA-Werbefilm which produces publicity films. This outfit which has its seat in Duesseldorf as well as in Berlin is particularly active with pix for industrial firms and spots for the native tv.

There are UFA's dubbing plants which take care of a constant flow of foreign films. UFA's synchronization department (at Berlin-Tempelhof) handles the British Rank films and part of Columbia pix, among others.

Music Publishing

There are three UFA-owned music publishing houses: UFA-Musikverlag, UFA-Ton and Wiener Boheme Verlag of which the latter claims the biggest catalog of film scores and songs in this country.

UFA's property finally includes productions of the old (pre-1945) Terra-Film, Berlin-Film and UFA-Filmkunst.

It may be interesting to cite who's in the current UFA. It's a concern composed of five banking houses, namely Deutsche Bank, Dresdner Bank, Bankhaus Salomon Oppenheim, Bankhaus Delbrueck-Schickler (Hamburg) and Burkhardt (Essen), then Agfa (Leverkusen), Zeiss-Ikon, the Geyer laboratories of Hamburg and two shareholders, Tischendorf and the widow of Berlin pic producer, Kurt Schulz. The two latter's shares are very minor though.

Dr. Max Bruecher, chairman of UFA's executive committee, assured this reporter that UFA is a healthy enterprise in every respect.

With regard to UFA's studio facilities, he said this: "The Mainz Television (second W-German Tv network which starts operating April 1) has rented stage No. 4 for eight years and also an administration building on its Berlin stronghold. Stage No. 2 has been rented by Station Free Berlin's tv production while three other stages (1, 3 and 5) have been rented to other tv units."

Last year, Walter Wood utilized the UFA studios for his Metro release, "The Tunnel 28," in which, incidentally, also UFA had invested money.

With regard to UFA's cinema chain, Bruecher pointed out that the nationality of a film doesn't matter. The commercial angle plays the dominating role.

"UFA's newsreel will undergo a change," Bruecher said. "We're looking for a new form. We can't beat the topical advances of television which comes along with news every day. We aim at contributions of more timeless calibre, perhaps some special series or so."

And what about UFA's theatrical films which, after all, represented once this concern's main activity? Bruecher: "We have realized that it is not wise to produce feature films any longer under the present conditions in Germany. This business has become too big a speculation. Also, our shareholders are against the production of feature films. The banks wouldn't supply any money any longer. The decentralization of cultural life in Germany is responsible for this situation, the absence of a cultural central point respectively. The postwar development has led to a split-up of cultural and artistic forces in Germany. The film suffers too much from this situation."

"Also," Bruecher said, "we have to go with the times. Television is now the big thing and we have a substantial lineup of commissioned tv films on our list. Also, we'll start shooting television films of our own soon."

Within the years 1956-1961, the new UFA (founded in 1956) turned out a total of 37 films, either productions of its own or films on commission. Oddly enough none of the films proved a real hit. A good number, in fact, was very much on the mediocre side. It's now admitted that the UFA then made too many mistakes: It picked the wrong stories, there were neither the qualified dramaturgists nor the best writers, there was poor planning and certainly Arno Hauke, the then UFA chieftain, was not the right man to head this enterprise.

UFA's last film was "The Miracle of Malachias" (1961) which was more or less responsible for the bankruptcy of UFA Film-Hansa, the distributing company which had an administration of its own but in which UFA was a 50% participant. The film which Bernhard Wicki directed was supposed to cost 1,800,000 D-Marks ($450,000) but whose costs climbed up to 3,000,000 D-Marks ($750,000) due to delays and various internal troubles. Moreover, the pic didn't prove of public appeal and the loss was too much for the distributing company. There had been several commercial UFA flops before but the dilemma the UFA registered with "Malachias" made the UFA people realize that they had better give up the production of feature films. And that's what they did.

In West Germany U.S. Takes Lead With 'Classified'

Frankfurt.

United States came out way in the lead with the highest number of "classified" films playing in West Germany during 1962. The pictures which are designated "especially worthy" (the highest classification) or "worthy" by the West German Film Classification Board means that the theatres playing them get certain tax relief. In 1962 the cinemas in West Germany and West Berlin showed:

128 American films
84 Franco-Italian
[illegible] German films
46 British films
41 French films
37 Italian films
10 Austrian films
71 from all other lands.

Of these, one German film "Das Brot der Frueher Jahre" (Bread of Earlier Years), a Modern Art Production, received the "Especially Worthy" tag. 25 foreign films (including 14 American) received the same classification. 53 foreign films (including 20 American) received the "worthy" classification. 10 German films received the "worthy" classification.

Germany's Directors: A Capsulated Series of Professional Dossiers

By HANS HOEHN

Berlin.

Within German show biz, the film industry is in the worst shape. Apart from the fact that production figures have been on a steady decline (106 in 1959, 96 in 1960, 79 in 1961) during the past years, the number of "boxoffice pix" (in an international sense) has shrunk too. The year of 1962 marked a record low both financially and artistically. There are just too many handicaps the German film has to face.

Omit the financial dilemma, amusement taxes, strong foreign competition, tv, rising production costs, German film also suffers a mental crisis. What is turned out is mostly seen-and-forgotten fare.

Here, in alphabetical order, are more than five dozen domestic (including some with foreign passports) directors and their 1962 status:

Hans Albin—Nothing to mention.

Helmuth Ashley—Former cameraman who revealed directorial talents via his "Murder Game" and in whom one still puts hope.

Axel von Ambesser—One of the few German directors who display style. Not very active in 1962. His last effort was a Heinz Ruehmann starrer which hasn't been shown in Berlin yet.

Franz Antel—German and Austrian slapstick routine.

Helmut M. Backhaus—No 1962 status.

Josef von Baky—Still rates as one of this country's better directors. At least takes care of good entertainment.

Wolfgang Becker—Pix for home consumption.

Eduard von Borsody—Oldtimer. More routine.

Hans Dieter Bove—Made a pic entitled "Whenever It Becomes Night."

Geza von Cziffra—Escapist fare of both German and Austrian origin.

Hans Deppe—Another oldtimer of no special bite.

Hans Domnick—Maker of full-length documentaries. His second part of "Dream Road of the World" pleased the customers.

Peter Goldbaum—Producer-director of "My Husband, the Golden Monkey" (Somerset Maugham comedy), which hasn't come to Berlin yet.

Juergen Goslar — Actor who turned directing. Made three pix in 1962. Reviews weren't so bad.

Hans Grimm—Director of nice comedies for the home market, but not more than nice.

Kurt Hoffmann—Still rates as one of Germany's most prominent directors. Ought to eventually come along with another good one.

Werner Jacobs—One of the busier German pic creators but his creations are only so-so.

Rudolf Jugert—Once one of Germany's better directors, his current status is only average.

Helmut Kautner—Seems to have lost his knack. His "Redhead," Germany's entry at 1962 Berlin film festival, was a disappointment. Same goes for the two pix he made before that one. 1962 his most disappointing year.

Michael Kehlmann—Better at home with tv.

Werner Klingler—Dedicates himself to thriller type features such as "The Secret of the Black Trunk" and "The Testament of Dr. Mabuse." Okay stuff for the native action trade.

Hermann Kugelstadt—He made a pic entitled "Dangerous Journey" which didn't stir attention.

Fritz Lang—His silent classic, "Metropolis," was reissued in 1962. So they talked about him again.

Hermann Leitner—German and Austrian average features.

Wolfgang Liebeneiner — His name is still widely known but he oughta do something to keep it alive.

Ralph Lothar—A question mark.

Georg Marischka—Started directing "Axel Munthe, the Doctor of San Michele" but, after controversy with pic's star, O. W. Fischer, turned over direction to Rudolf Jugert.

Franz Marischka—The busiest of the Marischkas. Conventional comedies make up his activity.

Paul Martin—Sticks to German musicals.

Paul May—His last pix hardly rated. He too used to be one of this country's better directors.

Imo Moszkowicz—"Max, the Story of a Pickpocket," Heinz Ruehmann starrer, proved pleasant German tongue-in-cheek. His latest, "Street of Temptation," not shown here as yet.

Wolfgang Neuss — Cabaretist marked his directorial debut with "Comrade Muenchhausen" which didn't make the big grade.

Raphael Nussbaum—Young (31) producer-director turned out an outstanding full-length documentary, "From Tsar to Stalin."

John Olden—Still more successful as a tv director. Fell seriously ill (heart attack) last year.

Eric Ode—Plain average.

Rolf Olsen—Remarkably active, both in German and Austrian studios, but impression vague.

Hans Quest—Nothing heard of him lately. But his tv series, "The Scarf" (in early 1962) one of the most successful of its kind. It virtually kept millions spellbound.

Tom Pevsner—Directed the Lilli Palmer starrer, "Do You Think, Constance Is Behaving Allright?" which was slightly better than its clumsy title.

Harald Philipp—Was much better two and three years ago than last year.

Hansjuergen Pohland—Was producer-director of shorts, then directed his first feature, "Tobby," and produced "Bread of Former Youth," Germany's entry at Cannes. Both efforts a far cry from being successes.

Geza von Radvany—One of those who couldn't maintain former good reputation.

Akos von Rathony—His "A Daring Chap in Crooked Tour" was much better than many critics thought. They underestimate him.

Gottfried Reinhardt—His last film seen here was the Austrian-made "Everyman."

Harald Reinl—Busy man. Lineup of pix include the Lex Barker starrers, "In the Stockcoat of Dr. Mabuse," "The Invisible Claws of Dr Mabuse" and "Treasure in the Silver Sea."

Juergen Roland—A former tv director, he tries to thrill customers. One of his last efforts was "Hot Harbor Hongkong"—just so-so.

Wolfgang Schleif—Also quite busy. His "Matrimonial Agency Aurora" wasn't so bad a pic. He manages to overcome the script deficiencies.

Rudolf Schuendler—Routine.

Robert Siodmak—Of the various ex-Germans who returned from Hollywood within the postwar years, he may be regarded as the most successful and active. His last work was "Tunnel 28" (Escape From East Berlin) for Metro.

Wolfgang Staudte—Is (at this writing) directing the remake of Brecht-Weill's "Three Penny Opera," one of the most ambitious (and most expensive too) German pix in quite some time.

Rolf von Sydow — Directed "Thick Air," a slapstick comedy, looped after the new Electronic Cam system. Nothing special otherwise.

Rolf Thiele—His Austrian "Lulu" may have made some good money but didn't delight the critics. His "Black-White-Red Four Poster" is awaited.

Ernst von Theumer — Made "Camp of the Condemned" which didn't command notice.

Fritz Umgelter—Works in film and tv biz. ". . . Only the Wind," Freddy Quinn starrer, among his latest cinema efforts. Okeh.

Ladislao Vajda—Hungarian-born Spaniard keeps deserving praise for he's got something that bulk of German directors lack—charm. And he avoids cheap sex and silly gags. Creator of lovable family entertainment.

Paul Verhoeven—Generally a director beyond the domestic average. His 1962 venture, "Her Most Beautiful Day," wasn't one of his best though.

Herbert Vesely—"Bread of Former Youth" marked his debut as a feature director—a whale of a disappointment.

Victor Vicas—Nothing heard of him here since his "Two Among Millions" in 1961.

Alfred Vohrer—Can't complain about lack of assignments. Last efforts include thrillers of average calibre.

Bernhard Wicki—Still benefits from his "Bridge" success.

Alfred Weidenmann—His Austrian-French Lilli Palmer starrer, "Julia, You're Wonderful," was quite a success. His German, "I Too Am Only a Woman," Maria Schell starrer, is soon to be released.

Jochen Wiedermann—Still hasn't achieved particular prominence as yet.

Kurt Wilhelm — His "Gypsy Baron" may be "acclaimed" as the poorest German pic of 1962.

Franz Josef Wild—Nothing heard of him lately.

Franz Peter Wirth—ditto.

Frank Wisbar—"Barbara" among his last pix. As said last year, hasn't come up with a real attention-getting pic in quite some time.

Edwin Zbonek—His initial feature, "Love Hangs On the Gallows," still well remembered. "Germany, Your Starlets" wasn't so successful. But they still put some hope in this young film director.

If Voters Agree Switzerland To Get New Studio

By GEORGE MEZOEFI

Zurich.

The first Swiss film studio with modern facilities, in the planning stage for years, may finally be built this year, provided the indispensable financial aid by the city and canton (state) of Zurich is approved by public voting.

This decision should come in the next few months. Authorities have declared their readiness to provide substantial subsidies, amounting to several millions of Swiss francs, but are required by law to obtain the people's consent in cases where such important credits are involved. The ground, near Zurich, on which the new studio is to be built, will be made available free by the city of Zurich. Technical facilities will most probably be merged with those of the new Zurich television studio construction of which is also imminent.

Building cost of the film studio, beside the state subsidy, is secured by private sources, with the remainder to be financed by mortgage credits. About 70% of the basic private funds are Swiss, 30% from German and American producers of theatrical and tv films to whom the studio will eventually be open for renting.

Blueprints are all ready, and construction is expected to be taken up pronto once the state credits have passed in public voting.

A new studio would be a blessing. Swiss producers, for years now, have been obliged to improvise by improvising ersatz studio space in schoolhouses, gyms, inns etc. for interiors. Alternately, entire productions had to be moved abroad (notably to Germany) which naturally burdened budgets.

Only studio existing here so far, the Rosenhof, has such limited facilities (two sound stages) that it has become practically obsolete for present day feature production. At the moment it's exclusively for the production of advertising shorts, which keeps it 100% occupied all year round.

Average scales for artistic and technical personnel in Swiss feature production vary so much that no comparative figures are available. However, top straight salary for a Swiss player in a purely local dialect film is believed to be as low as SFrs. 15,000 ($3,500) even in cases of local "name" players.

Things look different in Swiss-German co-production where German players, directors, scripters and technicians are hired next to the local talent. In view of German conventions re talent fees, salaries are bound to be up to German standards.

SWISS GO FOR GERMAN COWBOYS

By GEORGE MEZOEFI

Zurich.

Switzerland was never the most film-conscious country in Europe, but, up until a few years ago, at least certain rules-of-thumb made the presumable boxoffice potential of different types of pictures, as well as the drawing power of stars, predictable factors. Naturally, "surprise" hits or flops occurred. But now it seems as though most oldtime rules might just as well be forgotten. They don't apply. Seldom has any film year brought so many surprises, both ways, to the Swiss trade as 1962, and the first quarter of 1963 followed in kind.

To start off with the sunny side of the ledger: Some film execs here gravely predicted that an almost war pic like 20th-Fox's "Longest Day" would never stand a chance for a longrun since, per experience, it would not attract women and that pictures appealing predominantly to males have limited b.o. chances. Instead, "Day" soared up to become 1962's top moneymaker here, doing "Ben-Hur"-type business and holding for a combined total of over 50 weeks in the five Swiss key cities of Zurich, Basle, Berne, Geneva and Lausanne.

'West Side Story'

Another former "rule": U.S. musicals are doomed in advance, boxoffice-wise. That one was cracked by "West Side Story," despite supposed appeal to young patrons whose potential is quickly exhausted here with minimum age of admittance fixed by law at 16 or 18. Admittedly, tunefilms rarely ever reached great b.o. heights in Switzerland, yet "Story" scored 60 weeks of playing time in the five cities and becoming a big grosser.

Walt Disney's family-type pictures such as "Shaggy Dog," "Toby Tyler," "Swiss Family Robinson," "Parent Trap," "Moon Pilot" et al. all fared pretty poorly here. Along came "Absent-Minded Professor" and snowballed into the alltime Swiss longrun hit at a Zurich smallseater where it held for over a year.

The films of Sweden's Ingmar Bergman, despite rave reviews and top interest with the "intellectual" segment of the Swiss public, never meant much to general audiences, until "Through A Glass Darkly" suddenly topped all previous Bergman releases by its 10 weeks' run at a Zurich arty.

German Western Clicks

Germany's first western and one of that country's costliest pictures of '62, "Treasure of Silver Lake," was believed to be an almost certain b.o. dud here since it is based on a story by Karl May, an author having a readership of 10-12 year olds. It became an amazing grosser instead.

Italy's recent crop of all-flesh, no-story nightclub romps a la "World By Night," "Europe By Night" etc. were supposed to have been milked to death after initially good returns of the very first films of that type. Whereupon a recent entry, significantly tagged "Sexy Al Neon" and not different in any way from its predecessors, racked up record grosses at a large Zurich house usually specializing in action fare.

Big spectacles are usually among the most reliable money-makers in Switzerland, as witnessed by the huge grosses registered with such films as "Ben-Hur," "Ten Commandments," "El Cid," "Quo Vadis" etc. In the face of this,

German Stars 'Runaway' to Other Greener Financial Pix Pastures

By HAZEL GUILD

Frankfurt.

Even if a West German film producer can scrounge up the financing for a new film, one of his major difficulties today is to track down a star. Most of them have emigrated to other lands, where the pay and the possibilities are better.

West German Producers' Assn. clamped down salary controls a couple of years ago, limiting a German star to a top fee of $25,000 for a lead, with sliding scale for parts in other categories.

This, combined with the country's dwindling film activities, caused top players to head for greener pastures. Maria Schell, for instance, now plays mainly in foreign films although occasionally slipping into a German role. Horst Buchholz has turned to Broadway (even though his two plays "Cheri" and "Andorra" were shortlived) and to Hollywood films.

Curd Juergens refused to accept the German pay rates, will now do German pix only when he gets producer credit (and for his recent starring role in the CCC-Gloria production of "Threepenny Opera" he got a paycheck considerably higher than the $25,000—explaining that he made the commitment before the pay scale was put into effect, and hence no one objected).

Karl Boehm, since "Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse" and "Brothers Grimm" is turning to the States.

Television and American nightclub engagements in New York City and Las Vegas have attracted the musical crew, Caterina Valente and the Kessler twins, Alice and Ellen, are now known to American audiences and receive considerably more money than they would in their homeland.

O. W. Fischer is still doing German films since his sole Hollywood venture, in Universal's "My Man Godfrey", was an unpleasant chapter for him. But he's a rather rare exception.

But now a couple of Americans are invading the German film business. Lex Barker has done a few top German film parts (most notably, in the click "western" shot in Yugoslavia and based on a novel by the German scripter Karl May called "Treasure of the Silver Sea" and in a remake of the "Dr. Mabuse" series).

And another American is very big in the German scene, comic and singer Bill Ramsey, who hails from Cincinnati, Ohio, but has made his film and television career in West Germany.

Among the stars who are continuing their work in Germany, the trend is to establish a residence in Switzerland, and thus, at least, take home a little more of the tax money. Current situation is that a "foreigner" takes home 80% of his film fee if he lives outside of this country, while a "local" resident gets only 47% of the money for his very own.

Thus even the German stars who are remaining here to do the film work try to maintain a full-time address in a neighboring land.

And with the local film industry pretty much on the skids, it looks as if it's up to the television to develop the new stars—so that they can be wooed away by Hollywood and other film-making centers still in the business.

Austria's Highest Honor To Composer Robt. Stolz

Vienna, May 7.

Octogenerian composer Robert Stolz was presented with the nation's highest award to an orchestra conductor—the Bruckner Ring, named for Anton Bruckner (1824-1896), famed composer of symphonic and sacred music. Stolz's predecessors were Wilhelm Furtwaengler and Karl Boehm.

The concert and the Bruckner Ring presentation was also televised via Eurovision.

WEST BERLIN'S STUDIOS

Berlin.

West Germany's film activity is in three places—West Berlin, Munich and Hamburg. There are smaller facilities in Wiesbaden (near Frankfurt) and Goettingen (Northern Germany) but no features were made there last year. In all, 64 theatrical films were produced in W-Germany in 1967. Of these, 21 (nearly one third) were made in W-Berlin's compounds. Short was taken up by television.

W-Berlin's three major studios are the CCC Studios (seven stages), the UFA Tempelhof Studios (also seven) and the Arca Studios (two). Both the CCC and Arca compounds are postwar creations. (The huge old UFA studios at Berlin-Babelsberg are in Soviet-ruled territory.)

The CCC Studios at Spandau (British sector) were set up by Artur Brauner in the fall of 1958. On a site used to house a poison gas factory, Brauner's enterprise comprises more than 30,000 square metres and is situated on a lake. The studios have been equipped with all technical novelties including the most modern electronic equipment for television purposes as well as installations for underwater shooting on a particularly large (1,000 square yards) stage. Like UFA and Arca, CCC operates throughout the year and rents its facilities to guest companies. CCC's payroll employees come up to around 300-400 people. Its maximum annual film capacity about 30 features.

CCC FACILITIES

Stage 1: 900 square metres; 8, 5 metres high; daily rental charge 300 D-Marks (heating: 90 D-Marks)
Stage 2: 600 square metres; 13, 3 metres high; daily rental charge 300 D-Marks (heating: 80 D-Marks)
Stage 3: 600 square metres; 11 metres high; daily rental charge 300 D-Marks (heating: 110 D-Marks)
Stage 4: 1,200 square metres; 12, 6 metres high; daily rental charge 540 D-Marks (heating: 160 D-Marks)
Stage 5: 300 square metres; 5 metres high, daily rental charge 210 D-Marks (heating: 60 D-Marks)
Stage 6: 600 square metres; 9,5 metres high; daily rental charge 300 D-Marks (heating: 110 D-Marks)
Stage 7: 300 square metres; 5 metres high; daily rental charge 200 D-Marks (heating: 80 D-Marks)
—(Note: $1 corresponds to 4 D-Marks)

UFA FACILITIES

Separate UFA Studios at Berlin-Tempelhof (American Sector) have also been equipped with all technical novelties. Auspices are particularly proud of music recording studio which is believed the most modern of its kind in Europe. UFA has also dubbing and printing laboratories. It has 200 people on its payroll and its annual film capacity is about 22.

Stage 1: 696 square metres; 8 metres high; daily rental charge 300 D-Marks (heating: 85 D-Marks)
Stage 2: 600 square metres; 7 metres high; daily rental charge 400 D-Marks (heating: 100 D-Marks)
Stage 3: 500 square metres; 7 metres high; daily rental charge 275 D-Marks (heating: 85 D-Marks)
Stage 4: 300 square metres; 4, 5 metres high; daily rental charge 120 D-Marks (heating: 30 D-Marks)
Stage 5: 1,100 square metres; 10, 6 metres high; daily rental charge 600 D-Marks (heating: 125 D-Marks)
Stage 6: 600 square metres; 11 metres high; daily rental charge 30 D-Marks per hour (heating: 12, 50 D-Marks per hour)
Stage 7: 700 square metres; 7, 5 metres high; daily rental charge 300 D-Marks (heating: 100 D-Marks)

ARCA FACILITIES

Arca was established in 1951 in Goettingen (Northern Germany) and started by releasing imports. In 1955 it set up its own producing outfit in Berlin and also built its own studio. Has a big and a smaller stage and is well able to produce 10 to 12 films per annum. About 30 people on its payroll. Back in 1956, it had more than 100 on its payroll but that was this enterprise's heydays. Two years later, Arca ran into considerable financial trouble and only slowly recovered. Right opposite to its studios, in Pichelsberg, a beautifully located outskirt to Berlin, Arca built a guest house of its own.

Stage 1: 600 square metres; 12 metres high; daily rental charge 300 D-Marks (heating: 120 D-Marks)
Stage 2: 280 square metres; 8, 5 metres high; daily rental charge 150 D-Marks (heating: 75 D-Marks)

MOSAIK FACILITIES

The Berlin picture would be incomplete without mentioning the big Mosaik Studios at Lankwitz, perhaps the Continent's biggest dubbing facilities. Founded by Ernst Wolff, who just recently (March 11) died, shortly after the war, this enterprise consists of seven studios. That W-Berlin became W-Germany's dubbing centre after the war is Mosaik's achievement.

Japan's Film Industry Problems Like—and Unlike—Other Countries; Admissions Diminish Before TV Competition; Forced Draught Quantity Over Quality; Great Artistry Achieved Despite Rapid Production Pace; Its 'Modern' Themes a Hard Sell in Western Areas

By DAVE JAMPEL

Tokyo.

The showcases in the exec offices and studio gardens of Japan's motion picture companies are filled with trophies won by their pictures at international film festivals over the last decade. But it's all just so much pretty bric-a-brac when considering the troubled state of Japan's film industry today.

From the peak year of 1958, when film attendance was 1,127,000,000, a remarkable 12.3 per capita, business at Japan's film houses has been declining. By last year attendance had dropped to about 370,000,000 and is expected to fall to 300,000,000 in 1963.

Film theatres in recent years have been forced to shutter at a rate of more than three every two days, their plots converted to much more profitable enterprises as garages and pinball parlors.

The industry has skirted disaster only by compensating with increases in admission prices that has seen the average ticket fee more than doubled since 1957 with an additional boost now being considered. Just within the last year, admission prices have been raised twice. The film studios has also benefitted from a significant relief in ticket taxes that was not passed along to their patrons. This has enabled the 1962 total take to reach $211,200,000, an increase of $8,611,000 from the preceding year.

But at the same time, studio expenses have climbed. Last year the picture companies were compelled to sweeten payment and working conditions for their administrative help after a series of strikes. This year the technicians are marshalling their forces. And 1,300 film players recently organized a union as their first step toward breaking the tradition of the paternal system where almost all actors are under exclusive contract to one of the five majors. The budding actors' group will seek greater artistic freedom, compensation for the showing of their old films and added welfare advantages. At the same time, in line with the nation's galloping economy, the prices of materials have soared.

Universal Threat: TV

This is a sad state for Japan's motion picture industry, which has a history that can be traced back to the turn of the century and which was flourishing only a few years ago. What happened?

Although a portion of the problem can be attributed to other forms of recreation and amusement that have sprung up to capitalize the burgeoning leisure class spawned by Japan's improved economy, the deathing state of Japanese films follows the postwar trend of crisis for picture industries wherever television has gained a strong foothold.

While tv in Japan is little more than 10 years old, it has enjoyed such a phenomenal growth that there are now about 15,000,000 sets in the nation, placing it second only to the United States in set count. Because of tv's comparatively late introduction in Japan, the picture people had the opportunity to study the casualties that the upstart medium had caused in the film industries of other countries. The top execs repeatedly proclaimed that they would not duplicate the mistake of being unprepared. Yet the only apparent action they took was to hedge their bets by buying into several of the newer tv stations. They believed then that Japan's huge population, now estimated at 94,000,000, was sufficient to keep their picture palaces full even in the face of free entertainment provided by tv. No doubt their awakening was rude.

What the film company toppers should have been doing in the past few years was streamlining their operations for the production of fewer pictures of improved quality which would play longer runs. Only Daiei prez Masaichi Nagata had the foresight to propose curtailment of production. But the operators of rival companies, like Toei, which controls the most theatres in Japan and was filling its coffers with the returns of assembly-line costume fare featuring swordplay, overruled Nagata and forced Daiei and the others to remain competitive by continuing their suicidal production rate. How could Daiei houses offer single features when Toei theatres programmed double-headers and sometimes triple and quadrupal-feature shows in the hinterlands. Rather than contract its operation, Toei launched a second studio.

Youth in Rebellion

At the same time, Nikkatsu uncovered a toothy, athletic young man named Yurjiro Ishihara, who won instant idolatry among teenagers and rescued the studio by starring in a cycle of films depicting youth in rebellion, thickly flavored with sex and violence. Shintoho, meanwhile, tried to fill the leftover bookings for these kind of pictures by making quickie versions of both types. That left the other three studios to scramble for the adult shmagers, in Japan as elsewhere the smaller segment of patrons.

As might have been predicted, the tv screen offered a plethora of costume action pictures. Last year Shintoho collapsed and Toei abandoned its Ofuhaut studio. The costly, involuntary adjustment saw Japan's 1962 production fall to 375 features against 526 in 1961 and a 1960 high of 547.

To combat the inroads of tv, Toho has maintained a policy of producing a wide variety of pictures generally geared to urban tastes, but with enough unsophisticated entries to also find a market in the rural areas. Shochiku, financially squeezed in recent years and compelled to sell some of its vast real estate holdings, departed from its practice of catering to middle-aged women in kimono. In seeking a winning formula, among its major efforts last year were a chilling samurai saga of revenge called "Harakiri" (this year's Japan entry at Cannes) and a venture into eroticism called "The Body." Daiei has made the greatest effort to emulate the Hollywood response to tv by producing two blockbusters at costs unprecedented in Japan. The first, "Buddha," said to have cost around $1,500,000, had a large success aided by the controversy stirred when six Asian nations protested aspects of the film before it was completed, on the basis of a magazine story. Last year's supreme effort, reportedly costing over $2,000,000, was "The Great Wall." Its returns have been disappointing.

Toho Vigorous

Toho is the healthiest of the Japanese film companies, showing an impressive increase in income last year and claiming the three top positions in the listing of the biggest b.o. films of 1962 with Akira Kurosawa's "Sanjuro," starring Toshiro Mifune, still another version of the legend, "Forty-Seven Ronin," and an international monster title match called "King Kong vs Godzilla," utilizing the talents of its special effects chief, Eiji Tsuburaya. Based on its hoff beginning, another Toho Kurosawa-Mifune entry, this one a modern suspense film called "Tengoku to Jigoku" (Ransom), may become the top earner this year.

It is only lately that the Japanese film leaders have come to realize their industry cannot successfully survive without significant overseas income. Hitherto they were content with their earnings from the domestic market, the prestige of their festival prizes and whatever money came from exports, which had a small, but certain audience in the Japanese communities of Hawaii, Los Angeles and Brazil.

Selling Problems

Recent, increased efforts to boost Japan's film exports have had disappointing results. Last year overseas earnings totalled $3,540,000 for outright feature sales, dropping below the 1961 figure. Target for 1963 was again set at $4,550,000.

Despite the technical excellence of Japanese pictures, astonishing when realizing that so many are made on break-neck schedules, their overseas acceptance has always been difficult. Their main obstacle in making an impact in Europe and America (South America has been easier) has been the difference in cultures. Japanese films set in modern times are especially resisted in foreign markets.

This problem is acknowledged by Nagamasa Kawakita, a well-traveled director of Toho. He said, "At the very beginning, when I first took Japanese pictures to Europe about 30 years ago, the people laughed at them. They couldn't understand why we take our shoes off before entering a room, why we bow when greeting or departing and why we eat with chopsticks. Now, at least, nobody laughs. The world is getting smaller," he added, "but it will take more time for our pictures to be widely accepted overseas."

Other handicaps of Japanese films before foreign viewers are their slower pace, disturbing to people of short patience, and a stylized kind of over-acting that is borrowed in modification from the kabuki theatre.

It is therefore no surprise that Japanese films not dealing with immediate reality have had the most acceptance overseas. These include mainly Tsuburaya's series of pictures showing giant prehistoric beasts threatening the world and Kurosawa's samurai sagas.

Kurosawa

While Kurosawa, regarded as one of the world's great directors, has built a following among serious critics and patrons of art houses around the globe for such films as "Rashomon," "Seven Samurai," "Yojimbo" and "Sanjuro," as well as the sans-samurai "Lower Depths" and "Living," the earnings of his films are limited. They do not play general release bookings. A commercially-geared film industry cannot live on prizes alone. Tsuburaya's sci-fi pictures bring more foreign currency than Kurosawa's epics because they play to mass audiences.

Contributing further to the frustrations of Japanese films abroad has been the lack of knowing and penetrating promotion. Bardot, Loren, Guinness and Mastrianni did not accidentally achieve global fame. Yet even a Mifune remains unknown to most Americans and Europeans.

Perhaps the most effective and fastest means of presenting Japanese talent to foreign audience to create a world following is through co-productions, presenting them with personalities that are w.k. to those viewers. But aside from those made with other Asian studios, the Japanese ventures into joint filming have generally met with failure. They appear to have been designed to save production expenses for the foreign participants, giving the Japanese only token recognition for their investments, which are usually not recovered.

Japan's film leaders can take solace in the belief that while learning from mistakes may be the most painful method of education, it is also the most enlightening. A film industry that survived the Great Earthquake of 1923, World War II and the restrictions of the Occupation will surely pull through its present crisis.

Pakistan Film Industry Echoes Woes of Struggling Nationhood

By A. CHAFFAR

Karachi.

Even after 16 years the motion picture industry in Pakistan is still groping for a foothold. To make an appraisal of the industry and discuss the problems besetting it, it is necessary to go back to the year 1947 when on August 14 Pakistan became an independent Moslem country. Till then the territories comprising Pakistan were a part of British India where the majority Hindu community dominated every aspect of public life. The Moslems felt that as their ideology, their way of life, their culture were quite distinct from the Hindus, in an India without the British they would not be able to lead a life according to the dictates of their religion, their genius. So they launched a movement for the establishment of a separate homeland—Pakistan—to consist of those provinces where they were in majority.

Feelings between the Moslems and the Hindus at the time of partition resulted in riots, loot, arson and mass migration of the Moslems from India and of the Hindus from Pakistan. As the Hindus had dominated almost every sector of life in undivided India, when the Hindus left Pakistan en masse there was vaccum in Pakistan in trade, industry—in almost everything.

Film industry was no exception—production, distribution and exhibition were entirely controlled by the Hindus. Lahore, in West Pakistan, was the only film production centre that fell to Pakistan's share. But the couple of studios that had been functioning during pre-partition days were now in a ruined state—the rioting mobs had set them on fire and most of the equipment was either destroyed or badly damaged. Cinema houses were closed down and distribution trade came to a standstill.

When the conditions returned to normal some Moslems, who had been in the film line during the pre-partition days, came to the forefront to reorganize the motion picture industry. Since then there has been significant progress, no doubt. From a couple of pillaged and burnt down studios in 1947 to seven fairly well-equipped studios in 1963, from an average annual output of eight films in 1948-1954 to 35 to 40 films in 1955-1962 is an impressive record of industrial expansion.

But there has been practically no growth of the cinema as an art in the country. The Pakistani film of today in terms of thematic values shows no progress whatsoever. If the film is accepted as a reflection of the personality of society, if it has to be a faithful record of the emotional currents, human achievements and failings in the modern age then the Pakistan motion picture industry has been an utter failure. A new country came into existence, the people became free, old values collapsed, and new ones took their place, but the Pakistani film did not reflect any of these changes.

The state of the motion picture industry remains as unstable as ever, its progress uncertain.

The major failings of the industry arise from weak financial footing, dilettantish attitude, plagiarism, conservatism, bad planning, lack of spirit of experimentation, want of discipline and sincerity of purpose, deficiency of constructive criticism and lack of healthy competition.

Films are made in Pakistan not because anybody wants to say anything but because there is an industry. And because the industry can only subsist where there are profitable returns, the profit motive has become the all-consuming objective.

The situation as obtained today is that imitators flourish and the traders prosper. Since finance is controlled by the business-minded trader who has no attachment to art nor any consciousness of the social purpose, films take the shape dictated by his monetary interest. The businessman runs the show, the artist has never had the chance to come up.

The contest between art and commerce in Pakistan's motion picture industry has thus been practically a one-sided affair.

India's Own Censoring Methods At Variance With British Raj's

By N. W. ESWAR

Bombay.

In the beginning, there was censorship. It was British and political at the outset in 1918. A main concern was lest the natives be stirred to restlessness by socially explosive suggestions. Only the year before the Cinematograph Communism Act had taken root in Russia.

What is patriotism today was, in the early 1920s, treason and not amusing at all.

Later censorship was exercised by regional Boards in Calcutta, Bombay and Madras. This had advantages and disadvantages as well. What was allowed in one region might be banned in another. There were cases, specially among foreign films, where films banned by Bombay or Madras Board breezed through the Calcutta Board.

In 1951 censorship was centralized. All foreign films were to be censored in Bombay, while Indian films continue to be censored at Calcutta and Bombay, but under directives of the Central Board.

There were conflicts when some producers overstepped decency and tried to take advantage of logical trends. There were cases where films already passed were abruptly called off the screen and reclassified or excised.

Things have now adjusted, producers have adopted a realistic attitude. There are few brushes with the Censors, though some Indian films get classified "A" for adults, or over 18.

Most Indian product rates "U", meaning fit for universal exhibition, which however is after some snipping. Under t bow is kissing or even a faint approach to it. Some directors ask an actor and actress to bite simultaneously into an apple or banana from opposite sides which is their trick to plant the notion. Forbidden fruit is exposure of the human body's female, torso or limbs. Low-cut blouses or overstuffed brassieres end up in the cutting room floor.

Indian directors vexed with Indian Censors or being lenient in allowing in imports what they don't allow in the native film. To this reporter the Indian Censors are really quite strict with foreign films. True they do not like to interfere with accepted modes of behavior in the country of origin.

DON'T OVERLOOK OIL-HAPPY IRAN

Iranfilm Studios Director Rezai Contends Whatever California Has, The Former Persia Has, Too—Describes Technical Facilities Available to Film Showmen

By ROBERT F. FREDERICK

Hollywood.

"All that California had originally to offer filmakers and much of what it has now, Iran can also offer." This was the message of Abolghasem Rezai, director of Iranfilm Studios, upon recently reaching the U. S. film colony.

Rezai is firmly convinced (and puts up some pretty sound arguments) that his country has every positive factor to offer in any co-production deal with American or European film producers.

"We have almost limitless sunshine, a great variety of scenery, and technical facilities as fine as Hollywood—and, in a couple of cases, possibly superior," he added.

Asked about the one factor that speaks louder than any other with Western producers — financing — Rezai replied "We are in an excellent position to furnish our share of any financing, whatever the budget—remember, we've got all that oil! And besides personal participation, the government, through the Fine Arts Dept. of its Ministry of Education (headed by the Shah's brother-in-law), is greatly interested in co-producing films, especially with Americans."

Another factor, at least at present, in the favor of Iranian co-production is the absence of any financial restrictions on any foreign filmakers such as those that have frozen funds in other countries. Rezai admitted, however, that the Iranian Film Producers Assn. was not completely outside about this "hands off" situation and would very likely protest it should it become an important threat to their own activities.

Pop Population Small

Iran, roughly the size of the U. S. east of the Mississippi, has one of the world's largest oil areas, about the size of Arizona and located in the northern part of the country. Of the country's total population of 21,000,000, only about about 200,000 are considered potential ticket-buyers. Because of this, the film-conscious country has turned its aims towards making films with an international appeal.

"Film is a tremendous means of communications," Rezai stated. "All imported films are dubbed into Persian, our main language. Our own film experts, whose chief markets, heretofore, have been Afghanistan, Iraq and the Persian Gulf "Shaikh" countries, now dubbed into Arabic for these markets.

"American films are now the most popular in my country, having replaced the Italian, French, British and some Indian films are also imported. The most popular American personalities are probably Jerry Lewis and Marlon Brando."

When asked about this rather wide range in acting tastes, Rezai said that the wide popularity of these two was greatly due to the fortunate choice of local actors whose voices are dubbed—that they capture the individual appeal and personality of the visual image. Ronald Chesshant, whose voice is always used for Lewis, is much like the American comedian in personality and style. This is very important as it can make a film a success or failure." He gave as an example of a bad choice, the dubbing of a film with Norman Wisdom, British comedian, by an actor whose voice was totally unlike the screen image.

Geographic Values

The non-technical values of Iran as a filmaking country, Rezai said, are 6,000 years of history; the temperate climate (Teheran is a mile above sea level); a multitude of scenery types—desert, sea, mountains, plains—all within a few jet miles; the government's interest in furthering the film industry with the accompanying friendly attitude towards co-production.

"On the technical side, we can offer American-trained technicians; excellent equipment and production facilities. For instance, Iranfilm Studios, which was established only two years ago, produced eight features last year and currently has six in production for local, independent producers. We also make documentary films and a containing weekly national newsreel.

"We are equipped for dubbing and lip-synchronized narrating into Persian, Arabic and Pakistani Urdu from English, French, Italian and German. We make tv commercials, spot announcements, produce tv series, and have all services needed for film distribution.

"Iranfilm can handle titling in English, Persian and Arabic. We have inexpensive production facilities for the creation of tv films. All the services needed for international co-production, such as commercial, public relations and negotiating arrangements are already in use. We can also offer language translation services.

"Studio equipment is first rate and includes a 35mm continuous contact printer for use in daylight when darkroom facilities are unavailable; low cost magnetic striping laminating machines; optical and magnetic recording mechanisms; and magnetic transfer systems."

Actresses And Scene

Asked about subject restrictions and local film taxes, Rezai said that Iranian films place less emphasis on sex and that the people (John Wayne is very popular) and want particularly for action films the historic, Biblical and other spectacle types.

"We want to help foreign filmmakers, particularly Americans, make pictures in Iran. The only thing we would get out of it is publicity. It would help build the Iranian film industry and also publicize Iran," he continued. He was quite positive about the working relationship of Iranians with the habits of Western producers. "Our people can meet any production schedule. There are over eleven months of the year when there is continuous sunshine and there is never any smog!"

The Russians have made overtures in the way of film coproduction but the Iranians aren't interested. Rezai's guide, while on the coast, and sitting in on the interview, is James A. Cook, research associate and tv production specialist, of USC's Research Institute on Communist Strategy and Propaganda. The Iranian producer will be here until Friday and is headquartered at the Chapman Park Hotel.

"We have had, and are having, negotiations with the Italians, French and British. We do not have any interest in the Spanish-speaking countries nor are we familiar with their films. From America we are particularly interested—in any coproduction arrangement — in securing the story of a film and an American director."

Rezai is currently working on the script of a suspense story based on a fragment from Winston Churchill's memoirs that takes place during the Teheran Conference. It evolves from an attempted assassination of Churchill.

Singapore Creates an Industry In Decade; Up From Scratch

By TOM BURKE

(Cathay-Keris Film Productions)

Singapore.

Ten years is not long in the life of a brand new industry, starting from scratch. And in an industry such as filmmaking which is highly technical, requiring the use of complicated machinery, much capital before any returns come back, a great deal of craft and some degree of art, it is nothing.

Yet in only 10 years, Cathay-Keris has become well-established; and this with nothing to work on—no cameramen, no technicians, no film directors, no editors and no film writers.

A bit of a miracle! How was it done? Largely by bringing in experienced filmmakers from India, where there is a long-established film industry, and training local people who showed an interest in film.

The Malayan film industry owes a debt to Indian film directors, cameramen, art directors, editors and other technicians whose knowledge and skill helped to found the local industry, and Cathay-Keris pays tribute to them here.

Cathay-Keris is proud of the progress it has made—in the number of films produced, in the training of more and more technicians, and most particularly in the way Malayan have taken advantage of the opportunities to come forward and play a major part in the planning, shooting and actually producing Malay pictures.

Talent Emergence

Today Cathay-Keris has four Malay film directors and one Indian compared with no Malay directors for the first six years and only one up to a year ago. This development has been reflected in the quality of the films produced which have year by year become more truly Malay in feeling, in values, in customs and in settings.

This development is also reflected in the atmosphere at the studios. There is more pride, creativity and general satisfaction than ever before, as the artistes and technicians see the improvement in the films they make and in the way audiences appreciate them.

But in spite of this progress, of progress in every field, the hard facts of money have to be faced.

There must be few producers in the world who make entertainment films for as few as 2,500,000 people and expect to get their money back. Yet this is the formidable task facing film-producers in Singapore especially when their films receive no favors over foreign films and there is virtually no overseas market.

Now Malay is the national language, films have taken on a greater significance in the national life, for films are probably the most powerful single influence in nation-building. With this very much in mind, Cathay-Keris has made a number of modern Malay-language films with "Malayan" characters —actors playing the parts of any typical, mixed local group — but they all failed at the box-office.

It would seem the country is not yet ready for this type of film—but this is only partly true.

The films must have much more money spent on them to draw in a wider all-community audience, so the films can compare favorably with imported films in scope and technical quality.

Also Malayan cinema-goers, who are vast numbers of films from all over the world, are discriminating and won't accept film with a limited appeal simply because they are made locally.

On the other hand, Malay cinema-goers do not support films on topical subjects in a Malayan setting because they say foreign films make these stories and they want typically Malay stories.

Thus a film producer falls between two stools and loses money.

No producer can be expected to lose money by trying to make "Malayan" rather than "Malay" films however noble and worthy the cause. This way he would quickly be out of business. Thus Cathay-Keris has gone back to making the less risky type of film based on Malay legends, fairy stories and semi-historical themes. In other words they must stick to the market they know in safe and which provide a reasonable chance of getting the production costs back again.

But in doing this, Cathay-Keris has never yet right of its goal of making "Malayan" and not exclusively "Malay" films, and the studio constantly strives to improve the all-round quality of its production.

To improve still further, the greatest need of all perhaps is for writers. Writers who are sensitive to the streams and strains of Malayan society, yet with a deep love of the country and its different peoples, and who are committed to the concept of a Malayan nation.

In the meantime such writers could introduce, gently, modern social and moral values into the old stories, thus satisfying the demand for re-living the glorious past, yet leading thought towards some of the problems that confront us all today.

Through this means Cathay-Keris hope to be able to progress towards making films which will play their full and proper part in the life of the nation.

In India Films Are 'Musicals' By Fixed Convention

By N. V. IYWAR

Bombay.

Second only to the story, the most important plank in an Indian film is the music. There cannot be an Indian film without at least a dozen songs, in season and out of place. While heroes and heroines were selected in the initial stages for their singing abilities alone, modern technique has created the playback singer, so that heroes and heroines can now be selected more widely and freely, with accent on other visual qualities. Whereas was not a good singer had no chance either on the stage or the screen in the good old days.

The Playback singer has changed all that. What is more, the Playback singer has become another invisible backbone of the Indian film today, for without the playback singer, there cannot be any playboy or playgirl on the Indian screen.

Naturally, the Indian film is now burdened with a star system as well as a Playback Singer system. There are stars who demand particular playback singers and since a particular voice has become associated and popular with particular stars, the producers also do not wish to take any chances. So they meet the demands.

The topmost playback singer is that little lady (unmarried) from Maharashtra who is in demand all over India and sings in almost all Indian languages. Lata Mangeshkar. Lata gets paid at the rate of Rs. 2000/— per song, a fabulous sum by Indian standards on which many used to retire in the old days.

On the opposite side are Talat Mahammad, Mahamad Rafiq, Mukesh, Hemanat Kumar and Manna Dey who all command anything from 2,500 to 3,000 rupees per song, from Hindi film producers. Among lady artistes who command 2000 to 2500 rupees per song in Hindi films are Asha Bhonsle, and Suman Kalyanpur, while a number of lady playback singers get between Rs. 400 to 800 rupees for a song in Bombay. Mahinder Kapoor is an upcoming male name in the field.

In Bengal, as in common with every other aspect in film production, fees for playback singers are not spectacular. The top singers do not get more than a thousand rupees per song. Hemant Kumar and Manna Dey hold the field here also, since they both can sing in Bengali also. Among the popular lady artistes are such names as Sandhya, Rana, and Arundhathi Mukherjee.

In the South, which is really more mad after music, the roster is really big, though payments vary from 500 to 1,000 rupees, with the average around 700 per song. The leading lady artistes down South are Saroja, Jikki, Lavia, Komala, Vasanthakumari Pattammal while the leading male playback singers are Seerkazi Rajan, Lagunathan, Sirnivas, Ghantasala and Raja. Of course there are many more names, but it is difficult to name them all.

Chorus singers in all the three production centres get 100 rupees for every song.

Feature Studios In Pakistan Give Rentals & Cheap

Karachi.

For outdoor shooting, Pakistan affords immense opportunities. The country is rich in natural scenery and the colorful landscapes provide excellent imagery. The blend of the modern with the ancient provide pictures of intriguing contrast.

Studio facilities are adequate for conventional black and white films. One studio in Lahore has facilities for color developing and printing. A studio in Dacca has plans to install a color processing plant in the near future. The same studio is also working on a project involving the construction of three large stages which will be suitable for shooting films in widescreen processes.

Altogether there are seven studios in the country, but only four are equipped with the latest automatic machinery. Details of the different studios are given below:

Shalimar Films Ltd., Lahore

Rental charges per 8-hour shift: 600 to 1,000.

Stages: Three and two are under construction.

Size of stages: 100 ft. x 60 ft., 100 ft. x 100 ft., 100 ft. x 60 ft.; and the under-construction ones are of 100 ft. x 60 ft. and 100 ft. x 70 ft.

Equipment: Cameras—2 Mitchell with blimps, one Bell Howell Parvo, 1 Bowen zoom lens, 2 dollies, trolley and cranes.

Sound—Complete filmo Recorder dubbing system, complete RCA sound recording equipment with playback, two re-recorders, projectors.

Laboratories—A complete laboratory, 30 units of editing equipment, one optical printer.

Lights—In good quantity to shoot any kind of film.

Shalimar Films Ltd. is the oldest and the largest studio in Pakistan. The managing director is Syed Shaukat Hussain Rizvi who is also a producer and director.

Evernew Studios, Lahore

The studio is divided into two portions—one known as the old studio and the other is the new one which has been recently constructed.

Rental charges per 8-hour shift: 600 for the old, and 1,000 to 1,500 for the new.

Equipment: Mitchell, Bell, Howell Parvo and Arriflex cameras, 2, 3 and 5 magazine models, 3 sound recorded with complete laboratory and editing facilities, adequate number of lights, and a color processing laboratory which is not being properly utilized as no feature films are made in color.

Stages: 1 in the old studios—60 ft. x 30 ft. each, 1 in the new one—100 ft. x 60 ft., 100 ft. x 60 ft., and 100 ft. x 60 ft.

Jawahar Studios, Lahore

Rental charges per 8-hour shift: 1000.

Stages: 2—100 ft. x 60 ft. each.

Equipment: Mitchell, Bell, Howell cameras one zoom model, 3 recording sets, 4 units for lights, complete trolley and other laboratory processing facilities, fairly good number of lights.

Evergreen Studios, Lahore

Evergreen and Jawahar 2 based at New Lion Town are small and equipped with modest machinery for making commercial films and black and white films. Rental charges are between Rs and Rs per 8-hour shift.

Eastern Studios, Karachi

Rental charges per 8-hour shift: 1000.

Stages: 2—100 ft. x 60 ft., 100 ft. x 50 ft., and 60 ft. x 40 ft.

Equipment: Cameras—1 Newall blimped, 1 Mitchell with sound proof blimped, two Bell Howell blimped lenses, 2 Arriflex blimped, 1 Bolex-zoom, dolly, 1 rolling tripod, 1 complete back projection equipment with R. P. screen.

Sound—1 complete Gaumont Kalee re-recording unit.

Laboratories—1 complete black and white processing plant, 2 Acmi editing tables, 1 Hall and Brown projector, 2 grad ing tables, 1 negative and four-way cutting chambers, 1 silver recovery plant, 2 Gaumont Kalee projectors for rush prints.

Lights—Good number for shooting all kinds of pictures.

Film Development Corp., Dacca

This is a government-owned studio. It is equipped with latest automatic machinery for the production of black and white films. It has full laboratory facilities and is the only studio in the country which has "animation" equipment.

It has two complete units for indoor and outdoor shooting. At present it has two stages of average size. There are, however, plans to build three big stages which will be suitable for the shooting of films in widescreen processes. A color development and printing plant is also supposed to be installed in the near future.

Weekly Wage Scales

There are no fixed scales for editors, cutters, directors and other technicians at work. The scales depend largely on personal contact between the producers and the technicians. A rough estimate of the scales is given below:

Editors: $80 to $90
Cutters: $15 to $20
Directors: $400 to $150
Cameramen: $50 to $75
Cameramen: $20 to $30
Actors and actresses: $200 to $500 for the lead players.

Foreign Remittances

Tokyo.

Remittances in foreign currencies from motion picture earnings in Japan during the last five years through Oct. 31, 1962 totalled $36,276,000, according to Finance Ministry figures. Of the total, remittances from rentals accounted for $25,[illegible],000 and remittances from flat sales amounted to $10,[illegible],000.

Remittance figures are charted as follows:

Year	From Rentals	From Flat Sales	Totals
1958	$ 3,[illegible],000	$ 1,810,000	$ 5,725,000
1959	4,[illegible],000	2,474,000	6,307,000
1960	5,126,000	2,400,000	7,[illegible],000
1961	6,[illegible],000	2,881,000	9,[illegible],000
1962 (to Oct. 31)	5,340,000	1,340,000	6,788,000
	$25,[illegible],000	$10,[illegible],000	$36,276,000

Of the remittances from rental earnings, the remittances for the U.S. majors were as follows:

1958	1959	1960	1961	1962 (to Oct. 31)
$3,075,000	$3,321,000	$4,481,000	$5,097,000	$5,156,000

India Prolific in Film Features; Ratio of B.O. Flops Also Large

Bombay.

In recent years India's film production has been hampered because of restrictions on imports of raw stock and paucity risk capital. This is apart from heavy taxes, duties and excise levies. The position is gloomier still under the new Budget Proposals. All the same production activity continues more or less on the same predictable pattern year in and year out. That 90% of the features flop does not halt making them. The following is a list of the projected pictures for 1963.

K. Asif: "Mughal e Azam" (Love & God) in color, starring Pradeep Kumar and Nimmi to be directed by Mr. Asif with Music by Naushad.

Rama Rao and Raja Sree, directed by K. Gopalakrishnaiah; N. T. Rama Rao and Savithri; Ngaiah and Kannamba, directed by Nagabhushanam and N. T. Rama Rao and Anjali Devi, directed by M. Appa Rao.

FILM INDUSTRY OF INDIA

By N. V. ESWAR

Bombay.

From a mere 28 talking features made in 1931 in Hindi, Tamil, Bengali and Telugu, India today turns out an average of 300 films every year in all the languages of India, the principal ones being nine in number.

Some 65 Studios located in Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, Coimbatore, Salem, Hyderabad, Trivandrum and Alleppey, Poona and Bangalore form the broad base of the Indian film industry.

Bombay is rightly called the Hollywood of India in that it creates 50% of the films produced in India. Madras represents 38% and Calcutta 12% of the Indian production of films. Recent events probably make this ratio somewhat inaccurate. For instance, while Bombay produced only about 100 films during 1962, South Indian Studios accounted for 130 films for the same period.

Technically Up To Date

Almost all the important Studios in Bombay and Madras are equipped with up-to-date facilities with Mitchell, B & C., Eclaire and Eyemo Cameras and High Speed and Low Speed Cameras and Zoom Lenses. While all the studios have back projection facilities, those available with Rajkamal Studios in Bombay are easily the best, where they have six channel magnetic sound recording system available. Broadly speaking, about 30% of the equipment in Indian Studios are of the Westrex make and near about that percentage goes for RCA equipment. Some Studios have equipped themselves with German and continental gear, but these are very meagre and do not merit special mention. All the Studios have re-recording facilities, but in this connection the Famous Cine Laboratories and Bombay Film Laboratories have the best type of re-recording and re-recording facilities.

Rajkamal, Mehboob, R. K., Filmistan, Mohan and Filmalaya Studios in Bombay and Gemini, AVM, Vijaya-Vauhini, Neptune and Bharani Studios in Madras are equipped for colour productions, while the rest of the Studios in the country have equipment only for making black and white films.

The average number of stages in Bombay and Madras Studios can be placed at three, while the average number in studios in other parts of the country can be placed at two each.

The Chandra Art Studios have a 60,000 square yards lot in Chandivli near Bombay. Most Studios rent to independents to take care of overhead. The important Studios with greater technical facilities charge between rupees 1000-3000 ($225 to $725) per shooting schedule of eight hours. These rates apply to Studios where color films can be made. Studios with only black and white film making facilities charge rupees 600-1500 ($125 to $300) per day. Laboratory facilities go free with these hire charges, but where special technical assistance is required, these will be extra.

Except for purely technical assistants in the lower cadre, most studios employ cameramen, directors, recordists and others only on a per picture basis. In an Indian film, it is the Music Director who is more important than the Director. So there are some Music Directors who get as much as 300,000 rupees for a picture, while the top director of a film might get no more than 100,000 rupees. These are special cases. Common run of Directors would receive between 25,000 to 50,000 rupees per picture. The Music Director would receive up to 75,000 rupees for a film.

Editors

The average pay for a good Editor is 10,000 rupees per film while Editing assistant would receive about 3,000 rupees per film. The average cameraman gets about 400 rupees per week, while the really best command as much as 750 rupees per week in some cases. Some crack lensmen get as much as 50,000 rupees for a film.

Actually much staff in India is paid on a monthly basis, but speaking in terms of weekly pay, the regularly employed Assistant Director would clear between $50 to $150 per week. The average for the assistant cameramen would be $15 to $25 per week. The operating Cameraman who often has to standby for the regular cameraman might receive about $20 to $30 weekly.

Stars are contracted on a per picture basis. The top ones like Dilip Kumar, Rajendra Kumar, Dev Anand, Raj Kapoor in Bombay command as much as 300,000 rupees to 1,200,000 rupees per picture ($60,000 to $300,000), the lower figure being the more general.

Bit players range is 400 to 700 rupees per month on regular roll of Studios. Extras having to speak a few words or lines get between $5 to $20 per day, while individuals in mass scenes rate $1.25 to $3.25 daily.

Female stars get between 200,000 rupees to 300,000 rupees per film, while male leads in Madras get between 100,000 rupees to 300,000 rupees and female stars get 30,000 to 100,000 rupees. Scales in Calcutta studios are on lower levels and perhaps more realistic. Male leads there are paid between 30,000 to 100,000 rupees per picture, while female leads clear 25,000 to 50,000 rupees per film.

India remains a victim of the Star System where the same small group of favorites may be playing simultaneously in as many as 20 films. While some producers are trying to develop unknown faces such efforts are a minor activity. The only showmen who succeeds in this is V. Shantaram, since he is so far surefire at box office. Hence he can "make" obscure performers into stars.

Number of Producers, with or without their own Studios, who have produced more than 10 films is barely a hundred in the last 30 years or so. This despite some 7,000-odd films produced in the same period. India has plenty of fly-by-nighters. Ranjit Studios in Bombay and New Theatres in Calcutta would easily be the only Studios in India to have made more than 125 films since inception.

Japanese Import Lotsa Films

Tokyo.

A total of 1,270 foreign features were imported into Japan during the years 1957 through 1962, with figures for the last year incomplete. American pictures topped the list, with 786, 61% of the total. Next was France, with 140, Italy with 103, Britain with 78, Germany with 58 and Russia with 26. Chart of computed period:

	1957	1958	1959	1960	1961	1962
U. S. A.	124	116	127	117	153	146

Theatre Building Lags in Pakistan

By A. GHAFFAR

Karachi.

In 1947, when Pakistan was established, there were 300 cinema houses in the country. In 16 years since then there have been only 60 new constructions, of which 10 are in Karachi, 7 in Lahore.

Apart from the permanent cinema houses there are some 250 "mobile talkies" which cater to the requirements of the rural areas where there are practically no cinema houses.

On population basis, there is only one film theatre per 2,000,000 inhabitants. Situations are classified not as first, second or third run but on basis of entertainment tax paid. Those paying over $1,000 are in "A" category, less than $1,000 but $400 in "B" and less than $400 in "C."

Attendance

There is no record available to ascertain the exact number of persons attending cinemas in Pakistan. An attempt, however, was made to estimate it for three years (1952-56) on the basis of entertainment tax collections and known capacity. Even this data is available in the case of only a part of the country, the Panjab region. According to this estimate the annual attendance in the Panjab comes to 106,715. If we take this as a basis for the whole of the country, the total annual cinema admissions in the whole of Pakistan comes to 60,000,000. According to the estimates of Alexander Shaw, who was deputised by UNESCO to study and report on Pakistan film industry, the yearly attendance at that time stood between 25,000,000 and 40,000,000.

Films Exhibited

Over 50% of the houses in Pakistan exhibit exclusively films in Urdu, Panjabi and Bengali tongues—the three main languages in which the local films are made. Only about 10% show exclusively English-language films. And such cinema houses are only in seven major cities — Karachi, Lahore, Rawalpindi, Peshawar, Quetta, Dacca and Chittagong. All these cinema houses are equipped to show CinemaScope films. Only one cinema in Pakistan is equipped to screen Todd-AO 70m films—Bambino, Karachi which opened this month (April 21) with "South Pacific." There is no cinema house equipped to screen Cinerama films.

Patrons Drop In Japan, But Distrib Revenues Steady

Tokyo.

Admissions at film houses in Japan continued to drastically decline in 1962, dropping to an estimated 670,000,000. The peak year was 1958 with 1,127,000,000 or 12.3 theatre visits per capita. Annual count follows:

1956	993,875,000
1957	1,098,882,000
1958	1,127,452,000
1959	1,088,111,000
1960	1,014,364,000
1961	863,430,000
1962	670,000,000

The 1962 distribution revenue from Japanese films in Japan has not yet been tabulated but it is expected to be around $79,000,000, or about the same as last year despite the sharp attendance drop. This is due to two increases in admish scales during the period and an easing of the tax take which was not passed along to the public.

Domestic distrib revenue from Japanese films in recent years:

1956	$65,300,000
1957	74,700,000
1958	83,300,000
1959	85,700,000
1960	84,900,000
1961	79,900,000

India Thinks This Is An Original Complaint: Some Stars Can't Act

By N. V. ESWAR

Bombay.

Many of the producers in India are chary of naming their films in advance and keep the title-unveiling to the last in fear of duplication or scoop by others. Practice of title registration is catching on, but from the habit the majority prefer to identify their projects at the last minute. This is the main reason why the impressive production list (See separate text) has many "untitled" films.

As respects stars, Dilip Kumar, Ashok Kumar, Rajendra Kumar, Raj Kapoor, Shammi Kapoor, Dev Anand among the actors and Asha Parekh, Vyjayanthimala (who really belongs to the South), Mala Sinha, Meena Kumari, Saira Banu, Waheeda Rehman (who also belongs to the South), Shashikala, Shobha Khote, Nirupa Roy, Anita Guha and Sadhana among the actresses rule the roost in Bombay Studios.

Southern sector is ruled by the two Ganesans, Shivaji and Gemini, M. G. Ramachandran and S. S. Rajendran among actors and Anjali, Saroja Devi, Bhanumathi, Vijayakumari, Sowcar Janaki, Kanchana, Pandari Bhai, Jamuna, Padmini, Ambika and B. S. Saroja among actresses.

On the Bengal front Uttam Kumar Biswajeet among actors and Suchitra Sen, Arundhathi Mukherjee, Sharmila Tagore, Anuva Guha and Manju Dey thrill the hearts of the filmgoers.

Popularity does not imply histrionic ability; the accent has been quite accidental in many cases. There is considerable young talent in the country, but enterprising showmen and scouts are wanting. There is also the need for devil-may-care financiers to back talent.

U.S. Talent Union Execs' Salaries

Washington.

American Federation of Musicians paid its officers and employees over $1,000,000 in one year.

A survey of records for unions serving the performing arts revealed the Musicians' payroll at $1,134,040.15, with the American Guild of Variety Artists tab at $700,-808.21.

Actors' Equity disbursed $306,081.20 to its officials and employees and the American Federation of Radio & Television Artists dished out $146,015 in salaries, expenses and allowances.

Total disbursal in salaries, allowances and expenses for Screen Actors was $415,115.43.

Total paycheck for the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees was $412,303.32.

Screen Actors Guild trailed behind the other unions with its total paycheck of $98,080.18.

All the union reports, except the American Guild of Variety Artists, were filed for 1961 under provisions of the Landrum-Griffin Act. Latter, according to Labor Dept. officials, is being "processed." The AGVA report available here is for 1960.

Here is the rundown on salaries, allowances and expenses paid out by the five unions:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF MUSICIANS

'Pay Hollywood Not To Export!'

[A BISHOP'S SUGGESTION]

Minneapolis.

Methodist Church Bishop Richard C. Raines wants the Government to pay Hollywood to keep its features out of foreign nations because, in his opinion, "they tragically distort American life" and, thusly, do the U. S. much harm. He says he's finding considerable support for his suggestion.

Visiting Minneapolis where he once was just a pastor, Raines took a number of potshots at Hollywood during a newspaper interview.

Argued the Bishop: "If it is wise to pay farmers for not planting wheat, it would be even wiser to pay Hollywood for not showing its pictures outside of the U. S."

FAIRLY STAPLE WITH LIMITS IN KANSAS CITY

By JOHN QUINN

Kansas City.

Foreign films have a steady, if modest, place in exhibition here, with two art houses showing them regularly and major downtown first runs occasionally picking up imported product. Kimo, a 700-seater long operated by the Dickinson circuit, has been a kingpin of foreign product, while the Rockhill, 750-seats operated by the Little Art House circuit, has operated several years on art policy.

Best returns come generally from two themes, sex, or high comedy. A rambling third would be the thrillers. That's the way it looks to Glen Dickinson Jr.

Here as in New York City there's considerable reliance on reviews.

In some minds the label "foreign films" has become almost synonymous with naughty film. But it is doubtful if foreign product shown here has much effect upon morality in the area. Although Missouri theoretically has no censorship, Kansas has an actual Board of Review. Still exhibitors are reluctant to play the pictures that "go too far." If the theme be borderline, children can attend only when accompanied by parents. Policy usually is advertised in the newspaper ads.

A foreign film has a strike against it in Middle West on the score of language, and with few exceptions a little known cast. A quality film therefore is the only answer to compete, Joseph Terragrosso, manager of the Rockhill, echoes.

Names have some boxoffice merit, but the list is not long. Brigitte Bardot, Peter Sellers, Alec Guinness, and you soon run out. Sophia Loren is switch hitter, being good in both foreign films and American films, and Guinness, of course, is also in that class.

HOW TO BE A FOREIGN FILM BUFF

By NOEL MEADOW

(1.) Voice endless passion for these foreign films, mainly because of their English subtitles, which facilitate necking in the last rows because you have to swing your head sideways to read them.

(2.) Complain about the subtitles.

(3.) Be first in your block to set foreign films above Hollywood's. No matter that you're really mad about the free demi-tasse in the coffee lounge.

(4.) Argue about dubbing. You may take either side. Just so long as you stimulate the confusion. Be firm.

(5.) Favor four-letter words.

(6.) Dress for the occasion. Beret and sneakers for the male; sunglasses and slax for the girl.

(7.) Bring your own popcorn. Foreign motion pictures are notoriously shy on sound effects.

(8.) Don't spare the manager's feelings, if you've got a beef. Like if you know something derogatory about a sta s cousin, by all means let the manager know it.

Hungary's Hope: If Swedes Succeed In U. S., Budapest Can Make It, Too

Meantime, With a 60-Year History of Film-Making, Hungarians Win Many Festival Recognitions — Big Centre For Cartoons — Studio Modern — State Bank Sympathetic

By ISTVAN DOSAI

Budapest.

Hungary has always been a nation of considerable renown in the creation of stage plays and films. True, some of the Hungarian names to leave their mark on the cinema operated in Hollywood or London. Remembered here in Budapest are such names of Hungarian origin as Sir Alexander Korda, Michael Curtiz, Charles Vidor, Joseph Pasternak, Miklos Rozsa, the brilliant composer. More obscure as a name but perhaps most original of all may be cited the great theorist of cinema, Bela Balazs.

Meanwhile Hungary, a nation of 10 000,000 has an alert and ambitious film industry of which, we believe in much will be heard in the future just ahead. Actually features have been made here for some 60 years, making Hungary one of the oldest among producing nations.

Korda and his companions had to leave their fatherland more than 40 years ago because of the unfavorable political conditions.

It isn't probable, is it, that all talent disappeared with them? I think not. To take only the past year the Hungarian film "Escape to Prison" has won in Cannes the Great Prize of the Eurovision Television Festival. At the important documentary film festival in Oberhausen, in the German Federal Republic, three Hungarian films were distinguished, and recently at the Mar Del Plata Festival, "The Land of Angels" a film made by the young director Gyorgy Revesz, won the First Prize in a competition in which Orson Welles' latest picture was also presented. Thus: Hungarian cinema is living, existing, vital.

Hungary's Volume

Hungarian film production amounts to 20 features and 60-70 documentaries annually. Film production — as well as distribution — are, since about 15 years, nationalized. But this doesn't mean that film production is caught in the cog-wheels of state administration. Three independent enterprises go in for production; one of them is producing mostly feature films, the second short films and television films, the third cartoons. All the three enterprises work with a permanent artistic and technical staff. Our studios are rather up-to-date.

Financing of production is through the Hungarian National Bank. A certain share of the profit goes to the State. Otherwise the companies work with full independence and as they deem it best. I do not think that our film-producing companies would be more dependent upon the State bank than your United States producing companies are dependent upon the private bankers.

An Agreeable Bank

The nationalized system of film production has a particular trait which is considered by us as highly advantageous: the Hungarian National Bank is strong enough to lose money temporarily on film production — and this, in turn, grants the possibility to produce such artistic films, too, which recuperate the investment only slowly, or eventually never. The notion of cinema and of film art is not always one and the same and the affluence of audiences does not always take to those films which merit it best. This is how it is in the whole world, — and it isn't different in our country either.

Film industry is subordinated all over the world to box office, and this is quite natural, — but it is by far not natural that film art has become, too. The State financing of film production diminishes in our country the monopoly and tyranny of box-office to a certain extent. That is, our film production is, first of all, a cultural activity and not business. Naturally we are not enemies of our own money either and our greatest pleasure is if one of our films has an artistic value, — and does also well in playoff. This happens more rarely than we would like it.

The more we are annoyed if a film, expected to be a masterpiece, becomes an artistic failure and, in addition means a financial flop, too — and this, regrettably, happens more often than we would like to see it.

As by now you are acquainted with the Hungarian State and its bank with the excellent habit of being willing to invest money in film production, I would like to acquaint you also with some from among those, to whom this money is entrusted, — namely, the film directors. In Hungary they are the central figures of film production, uniting those functions which, in other countries, are divided between director and producer.

Leading Directors

At present about 20-25 feature film directors are working in Hungary. All have permanent contracts with the production company. They receive a salary if they actually don't work. When in production, they get considerably more.

Depending upon the artistic value of the finished films they receive various premiums and prizes. Box office hits receive further on a certain percentage of the receipts. Several of our directors certainly deserve to be presented also in person.

We have to begin, naturally, first of all with Zoltan Fabri, the Hungarian director who has the greatest international reputation and has attained the greatest number of successes. He is hardly over 40 and yet has already a long past as an artist. He began his career as a painter, then became an actor, then stage-manager, set-designer and theatre director. He went over to film-making at a mature age and already his second film was a revelation.

This film was "Merry-Go-Round" which has been played since in nearly every country in the world with great success. In the United States it was distributed by the very important Trans-Lux company and it is really a great pity that it opened at such a stormy time and under such conditions which prevented the well deserved and expected success. Since, Fabri has created two great films: "Professor Hannibal" and "Two Half-Times in Hell." These films are not yet known in the U.S.A.

What type of artist is Fabri? You have to imagine a highly cultured man with specs, whose modest, school-masterlike exterior hides extreme passions. "It is not a real film, in which nobody dies" — he formulated once his own ars poetica. His exceptional talent lies just in the expressive force by which he is able to project these passions onto the screen.

Let us continue with a younger director: Karoly Makk. He is the "enfant terrible" of Hungarian cinema, who always brings new surprises. I think that he decided already as a baby to become a film director and he was hardly 20 when he started working as Geza Radvanyi's first assistant in the production of the beautiful film "Somewhere in Europe." One of Makk's best films, "The Mouse Under the Rocks" has attained just in the United States a very great success, the Great Prize at the San Francisco Festival.

A Young Theorist

To the younger directors belongs Janos Herskо, too, — who is also still in his 30s. He attained successes with his films "The Iron Flower" and "A Handful of Happiness." He is considered to be an excellent theorist of film art. In spite of being young himself the education of the young film artist generation at the Academy for Dramatic - and Cinematographic Art is entrusted to him. He has just finished his latest film, entitled "Dialogue." He worked three whole years on this film, writing also himself the original screenplay. The shooting itself took six months. He has not shown to anybody yet the filmed material but this picture is considered to be the greatest promise of these last years in Hungary.

We have to mention separately two quite exceptional personalities who paved new roads in cinema and brought many a triumph to Hungary: Istvan Homoki Nagy and Agoston Kollanyi. Their specialty are nature films and this field of activity requires a lot of work and trouble, infinite patience and great knowledge. Homoki's full length films "A Kingdom on the Waters," "From Blossom Time to Autumn Frost," "Pals" and "Over Mounts and Dales" and Kollanyi's short films "Aquarium," "Living Traps" and the recently designated for the Oscar Prize "With the lenses under the Sea" have attained remarkable success from Japan to the U.S.A. Walt Disney wrote to Homoki Nagy, how highly he appreciated his merits as a pioneer and it will be just the Buena Vista which will care now in the U.S.A. for the distribution of Homoki's latest film.

Kollanyi's reputation is such that he was elected already several times Chairman of the ISFA.

Cartoon Club

I would like to mention finally one more name, less for the person himself than for the field of production which cannot be separated from his name: Gyula Macskassy and Hungarian cartoon production of which he was the founder and is still the most outstanding representative. From among his clever, high-spirited modern short subjects, recently "Duel" has attained outstanding success, winning various international Prizes, from Cannes — to Oberhausen.

I rather naturally mentioned things we Hungarians may be proud of and not those of which we can't.

To come to the essence: if it is true — and I would like to hope that from now on you will presume this — that in small Hungary interesting, sometimes even valuable films are produced, — how does it come, what is the reason why so few people know, and so little is known in the U.S.A. about these films? Frankly, I don't believe that the main reason would be all the storms, debates and misunderstandings which, these last years, accompanied even the mentioning of the word: Hungary.

If I were wrong, how could we attain considerably greater successes in countries which are thinking similarly, than we can in the States? And why cannot we attain, in your country, any considerable successes the films of other smaller countries either, of countries upon which not even a shadow can cast of the thoughts connected with Hungary? I am thinking here, for instance, of a "small" country like Japan, with its yearly 600-500 films.

The key to the situation lies somewhere else, much deeper, in the differences of taste and mentality. This difference has made, for a long time and until quite recently the film-market of the United States so closed that hardly any foreign film could enter. Since World War II, the situation began to change. Art-cinemas were established and their number increased continually; European films became more and more popular, though recently sex-films begin to cut out the others. Several American companies showed enterprising spirit. Janus Films worked a miracle by carrying to success films of such an artist as Ingmar Bergman of Sweden.

This is what lends us hope, too, and here we, ourselves, have to face another basic reason: if our films don't have enough success, then certainly our films are not good enough, or, more precisely: we do not have enough good films.

The Hungarian film industry is willing to collaborate with foreign film producers be it in the form of coproductions or rental of facilities. We have studios with a modern equipment and a really excellent technical staff. Conditions of travelling and filming in Hungary are very pleasant and the financial conditions offered by the studios are highly advantageous. Our cartoon studios are producing more cartoons for American order, than for the home market.

Walt Disney has shot a complete film in Hungary, nearly the whole artistic and technical staff has been Hungarian, including even a person of such importance as the director of photography. And you ask me whether he was satisfied? Disney wrote to us: "This past week I viewed the first cut of 'Hungarian dances' and enjoyed the show very much. The photography, the spirited music, and the colorful settings served as a fitting background for your talented ensemble. Harry Tytle and Steve Previn have told me of your wholehearted cooperation during the production of the film in Hungary. Please convey my personal thanks to all who helped make this picture possible, your organization, members of the ensemble and the production crew."

Poland Produces 25 Films Annually; Shorts Also Play Off on Television

By JOHN MINCHINTON

(Author of following text is with the Polish Cultural Institute in London—Ed.)

Warsaw.

Poland, now a nation of 30,000,000 persons, produces around 25 feature films a year. Some of these have drawn favorable notice in the west and at international festivals. It follows that Poland does well to do so much. At the end of World War II it stood in ruins, with 7,000,000 dead from German bombs, German camps and forced labor battalions. Never an advanced industrial country its facilities were devasted and the film trade needed to be reconstructed from scratch.

There were perhaps 120 film theatre in the whole country still usable in 1945. Studio facilities were as fragmentary as trained talent. Government initiative alone got the cameras grinding again, first to turn out newsreels and documentaries, staffed by the demobilized army film unit. A first feature was completed in 1947, "Forbidden Songs". By 1950 some 13 features were in the cans.

Today there are feature film studios in three cities: Lodz (three stages); Wroclaw (two stages—one 13,900 ft.) and Warsaw (two stages). Lodz and Warsaw are each adding an extra stage and developing recording and laboratory facilities.

Features are produced by eight individually named units, each of which has a nucleus of directors, scenarists, etc, and hires other artists and studios as required.

The Documentary Studio is in Warsaw and produces about 50 shorts and 110 newsreels annually. Educational Studio, in Lodz (one stage), produces about 120 films annually. Over 50 short films are produced by other small studios —films for television, animation films, etc. The Warsaw Dubbing and Sub-titling Studio annually prepares about 150 features and numerous shorts; Polish versions of foreign films, foreign versions of Polish films.

Distribution, export and import of Polish and foreign films is handled by Centrala Wynajmu Filmow, Mazowiecka 6 8, Warsaw. A percentage of the distribution income of Polish films is channeled to the production units, forming an important part of production finance.

There are now 3,640 cinemas operating in the exhibition network 1,510 of these are in towns. Cinema construction continues and 100 were built new in 1962. In addition there is a rural network of 300 mobile units, 35mm and 16mm—an important exhibition factor in a country with a large rural population. About 12,000 schools, factories, clubs, etc also have projection facilities, mostly 16mm. The total attendance at the 3,640 cinemas in 1962 was 186 million. This showed a drop of 3,500,000 in 1961, the losses being mostly in tv reception areas.

Poland's weekly magazine "Film" carried notices of the following in 1962: Features from Argentina, 1; Austria, 2; Britain, 13; Bulgaria, 1; Czechoslovakia, 12; France, 16; East Germany, 6; West Germany, 8; Greece, 1; Hungary, 5; Italy, 11; Japan, 2; North Korea, 1; Mexico, 4; Poland, 20; Rumania, 2; Spain, 1; Sweden, 3; U.S.A., 20; U.S.S.R., 53; Venezuela, 1; Yugoslavia, 7. Totals 22 countries, 202 films.

Since 1957 Polish films have found a secure place in the "continental" film market abroad. The films of directors such as Andrzej Wajda ("A Generation," "Kanal," "Ashes and Diamonds," "The Innocent Sorcerers"), Andrzej Munk ("Eroica," "Bad Luck"), Aleksander Ford ("Border Street," "The Young Chopin," "Knights of the Teutonic Order"), Jerzy Kawalerowicz ("Night Train," "Mother Joan of the Angels"), Roman Polanski ("The Knife in the Water") and others, have been distributed throughout the world.

Without question the most widely distributed feature is the spectacular "Knights of the Teutonic Order," which has been sold to almost every territory. Polish shorts also do very well, being in demand by television companies as well as film exhibitors; many of these shorts are deliberately made without need of commentary.

Poland's feature for Cannes will be "How to be Loved," with Zbigniew Cybulski.

15-18 Features For Young Alone Made Yearly in USSR

Moscow.

From the time Soviet cinematography took its first steps special films have been produced for children—from first graders to 'teenagers—in conformance with program discussed by educational and public authorities. As many as 15-18 full-length feature films for children are put out a year. Especial attention is devoted to pictures guiding the younger generation, helping them to grow up to be conscientious citizens, inquisitive, industrious, and physically robust.

A certain Finnish pastor once remarked that "Soviet films introduce schoolchildren to the radiant world of noble intentions and deeds."

To make films for children is only one part of the job. They must be shown to as many juniors as possible. In the USSR there are motion picture theatres especially for the film-goers of school age. "The Pioneer Pravda (Truth)" newspaper, circulated in 6,000,000 copies, and other periodicals for schoolchildren feature film reviews and cultivate good taste in the young readers.

Lenin's Evaluation

American readers probably know that in the Soviet Union both production and distribution of films are in the hands of the state. When the Soviet system was being set up, V. I. Lenin stressed the exceptional significance of cinematic art for the education of the masses. The state invests large sums in the development of the film industry. At present we have 34 studios.

Soviet Russia Annual Total Near 100; New 'Humanism' in Screen Characters

By NIKOLAI SERGEYEV

(Novosti Press Agency APN)

Moscow.

Soviet people like motion pictures. Last year Soviet boxoffices sold about 4,000,000,000 tickets—as much as in previous years. Isn't that good enough proof of the fact that Soviet films are continuing to draw the public?

As many as 100 or more Soviet feature films are released a year. That is far more than was put out 10 years ago, during Stalin's lifetime.

The big changes that have been made in the Soviet Union after the 20th Congress of the CPSU (1956) have had a beneficent effect on Soviet literature and art, cinematography included. First of all, feature-film release soared. In 1952, 23 pictures were produced. Last year the film studios of the Soviet Union put out 93 pictures.

This comprehensive program of film production has made it possible to engage the services not only of the more experienced script-writers, directors, cameramen and set designers, but also of the increasing numbers of young and talented newcomers, most of whom are graduates of the Moscow Institute of Cinematography.

The past few years have seen the release of some very interesting pictures. Mikhail Kalatozov's "The Cranes Are Flying" aroused a good deal of discussion.

Assisted by an excellent cameraman and the then very young actress Tatyana Samoilova, Kalatozov made a very stirring and poetic film. Not all the situations, approaches and character delineations were favored alike, but the vividly original talent of Samoilova was acknowledged by all.

"Stories of Lenin," produced by Sergei Yutkevich, one of the most eminent of present-day Soviet directors, was also acclaimed.

Hymns To Man

This picture was followed by "Communist" (script by Yevgeni Gabrilovich, director Yuli Raizman), a psychological picture highlighting Soviet patriotism in the early years following the 1917 revolution.

Three new and very moving feature films were based on Mikhail Sholokhov's books. "And Quiet Flows the Don" (director Sergei Gerasimov), "The Fate of a Man" (director Sergei Bondarchuk) and "The Soil Upturned" (director Alexander Ivanov).

Personally, I was impressed most by "The Fate of a Man," starring Sergei Bondarchuk in the main role. The celebrated actor gave a revealing screen portrait of the Russian patriot, the dauntless soldier convinced in the justice of his country's cause.

A veritable hymn to the Soviet man of our day is "The Ballad of a Soldier," made by director Grigori Chukhrai after the script by Valentine Yezhov. The young talented and temperamental Chukhrai accounts for two other fine pictures, "The Forty-First" and "A Clear Sky." All three films received high praise. Chukhrai's work is characterized by his desire to focus attention on man's sterling qualities, the mainsprings guiding his conduct. In "A Clear Sky," he disclosed the moral purity of a man who had been wrongly persecuted during the period of the Stalin personality cult, the man's unwaning faith in the triumph of justice.

A highly individual style is manifested by Yulia Solntseva in her two pictures, "Poem of a Sea" (1958) and "The Flaming Years" (1962), whose scripts were written by her husband, Alexander Dovzhenko. She is the first director to make a picture on 70mm film jointly with cameramen F. Provorov and Y. Teterin. The cameras and film used were Soviet-made. Since then several Soviet films have been produced in the same process.

Stimulating pictures were also made by Mikhail Romm, Alexander Zarkhi, Mark Donskoy, Vera Stroyeva, Leonid Lukov and Ivan Pyryev, to mention a few of the more celebrated directors. As for the younger set, those who have distinguished themselves most are Lev Kulidjanov, Stanislav Rostotsky, Yuri Chelyukin of Moscow, Chenghiz Abuladze and Roman Akhedze of Georgia, Latif Safarov of Azerbaijan and Yuri Kun of Estonia.

In the past five years 75 directors, 60 cameramen and dozens of script-writers and set designers have made some very promising debuts in films.

Bombast and pomposity of some of the films released during the personality cult era have disappeared. Feature films have come down from their pedestals, so to say, and have become more human and sincere. Many of them give a stirring and revealing account of the people's life, their thoughts and deeds, their joys and difficulties. It is the dream of the Soviet filmmaker to produce major issues on a panoramic plane. Naturally this is not simple to do. Characteristically, modern Soviet cinematography has grown both lyrical and philosophical, giving deeper cross-sections of the experiences and intellectual world of its protagonists.

"Seryozha," directed by Georgi Daneliya and Industi Talankin, "When the Trees Were Tall," by Lev Kulidjanov, "Open to Seven Winds," by Stanislav Rostotsky, are all different in approach and style, for far from rejecting different forms, styles and approaches, our socialist realism presupposes them.

There is the sadly fallacious opinion that Soviet directors such as Mikhail Romm stand for intellectual films only. That is nonsense.

This turn in cinematography was not achieved by a mere wave of a wand. It was necessary for the Communist Party to step in and enlighten the Soviet artists. This work is going on to the present day, as we can see from the meetings held between the leaders of the Communist Party and Soviet Government with artists and writers. Some pictures by well-meaning script-writers and directors turn out to be mediocre boring and sometimes down-right drab.

This was the case with "Zastava Ilyicha" ("Lenin's Outpost"). Script-writer G. Shpalikov and director M. Khutsiyev wanted three young workers to symbolize the quintessence of inquisitive, optimistic and enthusiastic Soviet working youth. They missed the mark, however. Their heroes turned out to be entirely fictitious, shallow, worthless and bereft of high ideals. It is clear that Shpalikov and Khutsiyev failed to realize the real designation of art—to reflect truth, to call upon men to progress towards a radiant future, towards finer ideals.

Yugoslavs Making 22 This Year

By STOJAN BRALOVIC

Belgrade.

According to the combined planning of the Yugoslav motion picture industry there will be in 1963 some 22 feature-length films and about 100 documentaries and "shorts." The following Yugoslav features are nearing completion, or preparing:

"Dangerous Road," produced by Jadran-Film, Croatia, directed by Mate Relja. Script by Anton Ingolic, leading roles in hands of Hermina Pipinic and two young boys.

"The Operation Tician," coproduction Avala group of English producers, directed by Rados Novakovic, script play by Vlasta Radovanovic, the leading roles in hands of Patrick McGee, William Campell (Campbell), Manja Golec, Rade Markovic, Miho Baloh, and several other Yugoslav actors.

"The Islands," produced by Avala-Film, Belgrade, and CCC Film, Berlin, directed by Jovan Zivanovic, script play by Jug Grizelj, principal roles: Elke Sommer, Peter Van Eyck, Branimir Jankovic and Ljubisa Jocic.

"The Days," produced by Avala-Film, direction and script play by Alexander Petrovic, the leading roles played by Olga Vujadinovic and Ljubisa Samardzic.

"The Moles," produced by Lovcen-Film, which serves the federal republic of Montenegro, but recently went into bankruptcy, directed by Milo Djukanovic, the artistic cast Slobodan Perovic, Olivera Markovic, Mija Aleksic, Jelena Jovanovic-Zigon.

"The Return," produced by Avala-Film, direction and script play by Zivopin Pavlovic, with Beta Zivojinovic in the leading role.

"Man and Beast," coproduction of Avala-Film and CCC Film of Berlin, directed by Edvin Zbonek, script play by Bent Koverthe, roles in hands of Georg Gec, Ginter Ungeheuer, Katinka Hofman, Nikola Popovic, Stanko Buhanac and Petar Banicevic.

"Long Ships," a coproduction of Avala-Film and Warwick Film of London, directed by Jack Cardiff, script play by Barkeley Mather, music by well-known Yugoslav composer, Dusan Radic, scenography by Zoran Zorcic and Vlastimir Gavrik, with Richard Widmark in the leading role.

"The Bridge on the Neretva River" (in preparation) to be produced by Jadran-Film, under the direction of Veljko Bulajic (one of Yugoslav's promising film director.

"Happy Journey to Hell," produced by Jadran-Film, directed by Nikola Tanhofer, script play by Ivo Stivicic, the main roles entrusted to Severin Bijelic, Bert Sotlar, Pale Vujisic, and Hermina Pipinic.

"Rudopolje" (in preparation) to be produced by Avala-Film, under the direction of Stole Jankovic.

"The Man from the Photography" (in preparation) under the direction of Vladimir Pogacic and the script play by Dragoslav Ilic.

"The Countrymen," produced by Avala-Film, after the script play of Milos Savkovic and Dragoljub Gluhovic, directed by Zdravko Randic, with Beba Loncar and Boris Dvornik in leading roles.

RUSSIAN GRIEVANCE: SHORTS' SHORT SHRIFT

Moscow.

The Soviet press continuing to display a candor unknown when Stalin ruled has lately carried a series of articles setting forth criticisms of certain film practices. One complaint concerns the neglect of newsreels and documentaries by the distributing and booking functionaries. This is a rough quote of one article:

"What use sending our best newsreel reporters to the far island of Cuba, to the remote parts of Asia, or the sandy dessert of Kizilkumor? What use making a documentary about the glorious taming of the Jenisey river or the construction of a new gas pipeline? All this is meaningless because the newsreels are doomed going to be stored forever in some cellar of our lazy distributor company, never to be released for showing in our theatres." This was said by Soviet film director Roman Grigoriev.

Grigoriev argues that the present two-hour performance in Soviet cinema houses should be extended to three hours and the extra hour be exclusively used for informational film. This is true service to education, culture and mass enlightenment. But the powers that control the channels of distribution are routine-trapped minds.

(This complaint is curiously similar to comment heard in the United States where the newsreel is a diminished force, the short a sometime thing and the documentary can thrive only if disguised as a second feature. There is, of course one significant difference: the newsreels and shorts were shuffled off in the U.S. because of the lengthening theatre programs, long three hour features, often part of a two-feature bill. To see the full show in many a neighborhood theatre an American must enter by 7 p.m. and hardly will leave for home by 11:30. —Ed)

Economics (Socialist Style) of Film Production; Yugoslav Studio Practices

Belgrade.

During 1962 Yugoslavia exported to 33 foreign countries, some 108 features and 142 documentaries and shorts. The exported Yugoslav product went to the following countries:

Algeria 4, Austria 2, Belgium 6, Czechoslovakia 5, Eritrea 1, France 1, Greece 3, Holland 1, Iran 1, Italy 2, Israel 2, Canada 7, Cambodia 1, Cuba 9, Laos 2, Lybia 1, Luxembourg 2, Hungary 4, Morocco 1, Mexico 3, East Germany 4 plus 3 for the television, Norway 1, Poland 3, Rumania 3, Switzerland 1, Tangier 1, Tunis 1, U.S.A. 6, West Germany 5, Soviet Union 8, Somalia 1, Vietnam 1, while the licenses for two feature films have been sold for the world distribution.

The documentary and "shorts" have been sold to the following countries: Britain 15, West Germany 14, Luxembourg 14, Belgium 11 and Portugal 10.

During 1962 Yugoslav studios rendered various kinds of services to 20 foreign producers.

Yugoslavia has several modern studios belonging to various companies rendering services and hiring its studios and other film producing facilities to domestic and the foreign producers: Avala-Film, Belgrade, Dubrava-Film, Zagreb and Film-Servis, Ljubljana. All three are equipped with up-to-date gear for film production.

There remains film censorship, but the producers, scripters and distributors have learned to take it. There is constant collaboration of representatives of interior ministry, composers, writers and culture.

Since the liberation of Yugoslavia in 1945 maximum stress in native features has been this national liberation struggle. Of course, there is clear socialist influence in the themes.

The average cost of a feature film is 60 million dinars (750 dinars to dollar). The most expensive Yugoslav feature film ("Kozara") cost over 400 million dinars and the cheapest cost 18 million dinars ("Zajednicki Stan"—common flat).

Director and the screenplay writer of a feature film (the production of which lasts from three to six months) are paid around a million dinars each, depending upon character, quality and available funds for the production.

A good, experienced highly qualified electrician would be paid from 10 to 20 thousand dinars a week, with the producing company paying his social insurance, medical care and taxes.

Soviet Product: 1963-Type Tales

Moscow.

With close to 100 features blueprinted for production and release during 1963, the Russian film industry is primarily focused upon internal release. It is not easy to predict ahead which of the films are promising for playoff in non-Communist lands. Plainly there has been greater receptivity since the quality of USSR product become more "human" and less stereotyped to the taste of the late Marshall Stalin. As recently as April 17 VARIETY in reviewing the Russian "Grown-Up Children" considered it a surprisingly successful family-type comedy suitable for global playdates.

Russian features do, of course, tend to serious subject matter, and especially close to the purposes of the Marxist-Lenin line. To suppose otherwise would never be realistic. Nor have the strenuosities of World War II been allowed to fade from consciousness here.

Events of 1941 form the theme of "The Living and the Dead," based on the story of that name by Konstantin Simonov. It details the courage of Soviet soldiers who never flinched during their worst adversities.

Lenin and Tolstoy

Director Lev Kulidjanov is making a picture about Vladimir Ilyich Lenin after the late Emmanuil Kazakevich's "Blue Copy-Book." It highlights a paramount episode in Lenin's life during the period when the October Revolution of 1917 was in the making.

Sergei Bondarchuk is working on a wide-screen color version of "War and Peace" after the novel by Leo Tolstoy, which served Paramount Pictures of Hollywood some years ago.

Vladimir Petrov, a veteran director, is shooting a large film based on Leonid Leonov's "Russian Forest." Yulia Solntseva is busy producing another epic film, "Enchanted Spring," after Alexander Dovzhenko's autobiographical story.

"Meet Baluyev," after Vadim Kozhevnikov's novel, and "Stars in Your Hand" (by P. Olshansky and N. Rudnev) are accounts of the relations among Soviet people, their ideas and actions.

The work of Soviet scientists is extolled in "I, Newton St." The idea underlying this picture is that the main features of Soviet scientists are talent, enthusiasm, high-principledness and industry.

"Test Flight Pilots" is a screen story about the men who risk their lives to help build newer and better planes.

Young director Tenghiz Abuladze and script-writer Leonid Cheladze of the Tbilisi Film Studio are intending to make a lyrical film about how Soviet girls and boys find their vocations after finishing secondary school.

More comedies, satirical films and musicals will be released this year.

Soviet Films

Russ product is unreeled at all the big international film festivals of Cannes, Karlovy Vary, Venice, Edinburgh, San Francisco, Cairo, Delhi, Locarno, and others. Last year, for instance, the Soviet Union took part in 30-odd such festivals.

In the last 17 years Soviet motion pictures have received some 300 prizes and honorary diplomas at film festivals.

The international festivals held in Moscow in 1959 and 1961 were widely acknowledged.

Japan Sees '64 Olympics Booming Tourist Trade For Nipponese Abroad

Tokyo, May 7.

While Japan is anticipating a boom tourism year in 1964 with the advent of the Olympic Games, it is probable that Nippon will concurrently see the biggest year in at least the postwar period of Japanese traveling abroad. The Finance Ministry is expected to relax the currency exchange restrictions that have choked overseas traffic of Japanese. Gradual easing of these restrictions is expected to begin with the beginning of the new fiscal year when it is believed, businessmen, scientists and scholars will be allowed to exchange currency for foreign travel. By October, it is expected that ordinary citizens will be able to require the necessary foreign currency.

The lifting of the lids could instantly launch a multimillion-dollar industry. Martin Pray, head of the U.S. Department of Commerce's travel service in the Far East, believes that some 40,000-50,000 Japanese have been hoarding savings for the occasion. He said at least 40% of them would travel to Hawaii because of ancestral ties.

At present, Japanese tourists are allowed to travel only as far as Okinawa and are limited to $400 a year in spending money. Other overseas traveling has been limited to politicians, businessmen on trips for surveying markets or cultivating experts. Many others go under these permitted guises and it is a common practice for them to acquire additional foreign currency through extra-legal means.

The budget for Overseas travel exchange from yen into other currencies is expected to be set at around $75,000,000. Ministry officials fear that there might be an even further demand and thereby an additional drain on the nation's foreign currency reserves.

Both Japanese and foreign tourist agencies are prepping for the heavy traffic in Japanese going abroad. Domestic agencies are expanding their staffs and opening overseas offices. The foreign agencies are naturally also acquiring more help, printing Japanese-language brochures and adding Japanese-speaking personnel in their overseas branches. After the easing of regulations, Pray expects more than half of the Far East tourism movement to come from Japan.

GREEKS AND TURKS NOW WORK TOGETHER

Athens.

Pinned-down facts about Greek production are not easily verified. Among expectations for 1963 is "Sagapo" starring Anna Magnani and directed by Roberto Rossellini of Italy. It's based on a novel by Renos Biasson.

Ilya Lopert was here from New York to confer with Michael Cacoyannis on a United Artists project. Again a novel, "Alexis Zorba" by Nicos Kazantzakis, is involved.

Luchino Visconti is due to shoot a feature in Greece during 1963, title unrevealed. His auspices have a tie-up with a newspaper to select an actor and actress locally, not necessarily or probably for the leads.

A first coproduction between Greece and Turkey, once implacable political enemies, will be produced by Damaskinos & Michaelides of Greece and the Byrcol Bros. of Turkey. "Heartbeat At A School Desk" is the title. Femme lead is Aliki Vouyouklaki. It was a stage hit.

Hints Yanks Muff B.O. Potential Of Thais, Indonesians

Hollywood.

Hollywood's attitude of indifference, complacency and shortsightedness towards the underdeveloped areas of the foreign market parallels the blunders of the U.S. diplomatic corps dramatized in "The Ugly American" book and film, pic's producer-director George Englund charged here.

Booming populations and "the bottomless thirst for the well told tale on the screen" found among these peoples combine to present a potential market which could cancel the effect of tv on the film industry, asserts Englund. "It is a great mistake," he contends, "to pass off places like Thailand, Iran and Indonesia as unimportant because they do not offer much of a market today," noting that "it won't always be that way."

Producer that we help these nations get more theatres through "lend lease, frozen funds or some other means." Estimating that "90% of what the peoples of Africa, Asia and Latin America know of us is through films" he believes such assistance would not only be in the interest of the film industry but would be for the national good as well.

Competition for the Southeast Asian film patronage is becoming especially heated, Englund asserts. He cites increase of from 35 to 60% in exposure of the Red Chinese product over the last five years in this area, also noting considerable Russian activity. Producer maintains, however, that we have one major advantage over them: "stars." He opines that one of the reasons for the tremendous popularity of the Hollywood "star" among the original peoples is the way in which they fit into the "hero figure" worship which is prominent in many cultures in this part of the world.

Enormity of the potential of this area was reflected in distribution of a film of Indonesian president Sukarno's U.S. visit of a few years ago, contends Englund. "In three months more of that country's 90,000,000 population saw that film than any other film in Indonesia's history."

"We are the only nation in with a truly international distribution set-up yet the foreign market remains a vague mottled thing," contends Englund. Producer proposes that the MPAA and USIA work together in ascertaining just what the dimensions of the foreign market is now and ways of developing its potential."

Take That 'Mediocre' Slump Away

Quality Blues of Spanish Producers Eased; Looked Like Running Out of Subsidy Money

By MANK WERBA

Madrid.

Producers in Spain are in a mood to sustain the heavy turnout of product averaging 80 features a year (including coproductions) for the past two years, despite early fears that new government subsidy classification standards might put a crimp in the trend toward expanded film-making.

When the new film administration took office last summer, it revamped the classification board and, in pursuit of official policy to stimulate quality product and discourage substandard pix, the board handed out non-subsidy "2B" and "3" ratings that brought a howl of protest from the industry. Subsequently, Director General for Cinema Garcia Escudero and the classifiers softened their position and the producer despair was dispelled.

The recent tendency is to utilize the lowest paydirt "2A" rating which offers a 20% rebate on the approved budget cost, while film authorities find more ways of encouraging the good than in punishing the bad.

One such step was incorporated in a ministerial edict creating a new category of "Special Film Interest" to parallel the already existing "National Film Interest" which primarily promotes pix on political, religious, or moral grounds. The new category, instituted primarily to reward top quality films, offers a subsidy of 50% of budget up to a new high maximum of 5,000,000 pesetas. Classifiers lost no time in applying the new decrees and conferred this bonanza prestige honor on "Dulcinea" and "Summer Nights," a first feature assignment for director Jorge Grau.

Film officials also transferred script approval power from cautious civil servants to the new censor board, where civilian and ecclesiastical members have already given evidence of willingness to lower the barriers on nonconformist screen themes. In less than six months, conspicuous changes are already evident. A new crop of young directors have filmed scripts, some of which were banned under the old regime, that have qualified by a wide margin for big film festivals. Relaxed censorship reins have heartened young and seasoned directors alike in attempting projects with a degree of audacity and inspiration notably lacking during the past ten years.

The modified liberty of action has brought with it a contagious optimism influencing many top Spanish producers.

Film-makers, on the other hand, are equally encouraged by the promising inroads being made by the blossoming, semi-official distribution network being created by Cinespana in Latin American markets.

Essentially, the optimistic attitude prevailing in the Spanish film industry stems from the young blood stream providing vigor and enthusiasm at a time of widespread consciousness that restrictive censor measures and routine subsidy rewards have failed at almost every turn to garner global prestige and world markets for Spanish pix.

Some cynical observers explain intense production activity as an effort by producers to milk the subsidy classification system right up to the time it is replaced by government-sponsored boxoffice percentage rewards. When the switch occurs they expect an appreciable reduction of native pix.

OPERATION BARCELONA: ALSO-RAN TO MADRID

By JOAQUINA CABALLOL

Barcelona.

It appeared at one period, now remote, that Barcelona for its climate, light, seaport and industrialism would be the cinematographic centre in Spain, as it has been in the distributing end of the business ever since 1900. However things have turned out quite differently. Now after 60 years the reality is that Barcelona has only two producing studios and those not first class. These are IFI, Espana, S. A., and Buch-Sanjuan, S. A. The former, which may be considered the best, are situated near the harbor in calle Marques del Duero, 106 and consists of two big stages, one of which can be divided into two. The equipment allows shooting three features at a time.

IFI would welcome chances to rent to any foreign company. The prices paid to such as director, editor, cutter, electrician, and actors are subject to a minimum ordered by the syndicate. However everybody is paid over and above such minimum and very often contracts are made with each party. The amount paid to a director to realize a picture within the term of 12 weeks varies from $10,000 to $30,000. Editor generally receives a salary of $200 per week. Cutter, or assistant editor from $20 to $60 per week. Electrician $30 to $40 per week. Actors are subject to contract deals separately and these waver from $600 to $10,000 depending on the fame of the actor or actress.

In a way prices are not a fixed tariff since it always depends on the personal merits or popularity of the individual.

Buch-Sanjuan Studios are situated in the Tres Torres district close to the hills of Vallvidrera, in Calle Vergos, No. 4-Sarria-Barcelona. This place is smaller than IFI, it has a big stage and is readying a second one. This is the former Kinefon Studios which was bought by Buch-Sanjuan and undergone modernization.

Spaniards Weep For Cause Usual With Exhibs: TV

Madrid.

Spanish exhibitors lost over $6,000,000 at the boxoffice last year as compared to 1961, and the reasons for this loss require no great difficulty to list. According to the report submitted by exhib chief Vicente Guillo to the General Assembly of the International Union of Film Exhibitors held in Barcelona in March of this year, the principal influence for a deteriorating local market is the continued growth of television and the sharp improvement in tv programming. The second reason cited is the growth of motorization in Spain as a result of stepped-up production of two and four-wheeled economy vehicles which have become accessible through widespread installment buying. Motoring denied the weekend movie-going habit which had not been affected drastically by the small screen at home.

Finally, exhibs in Spain were hard hit last year by government limitation on film imports. Only 200 foreign films were screened in 1961, of which a mere 80 were made in the U.S.A. Exhibs contend that Yank pix are the backbone of the business, and the limited import quota is insufficient to meet the national demand of second and third-run houses in the urban centers. Nor does it help exhibs in the hinterland where programs change twice or more weekly. Over 2,000 cinemas of the 3,000 in operation change programs daily, and most of the others change twice or more weekly. Under present restricted imports, exhibs claim there just isn't enough product to keep film-going interests alive.

NEW SPANISH EMPIRE: FILMS

By HANK WERBA

Madrid.

The evidence is overwhelming this spring that Madrid (and Spain) stand where Rome (and Italy) stood a decade ago, namely on the brink of a film production boom. As in Italy then so now here it is the superimposition of internationally financed, cast and motivated features on top of the native industry itself which creates the boom. In both cases there is the background factor of a nation coming alive economically after a moribund period.

The producers and their plans mentioned later in this story include many directors and stars branching out into the financing of product for capital gain potential. The British are prominent in the trend but the preponderance of "fugitives from Hollywood" is obvious.

Meanwhile "The Fall of the Roman Empire," being filmed in Spain, symbolizes fruition of the steadily growing Madrid potential as a global film production capital.

There is ample evidence that American producers feel that production costs in Italy have wiped out the inducement features the Eternal City offered until recently. Yank film-makers have ascertained that Spain can now provide facilities, technicians, topography, manpower, horsepower and numerous other film-making elements for the two types of motion pictures assuring producer profits in the world market — the super-spectacle in Super-Technirama or Ultra-Panavision, or the low-budgeter that can be brought in for around a quarter of a million or less.

Despite rising costs, here, too, pesetа budgeting is still a mathematically foolproof economy factor as compared to costs in other currencies. And the peseta has achieved a degree of stability that puts it in the same class for the American dollar.

Film projects are plentiful. Madrid is teeming with American producers, stars, screenwriters, production staffers, department heads, packagers, agents and publicists. Filmites now outnumber tourists at the Castellana Hilton. Residences at the Torre de Madrid, Richmond, Commodore and Milford are catering principally to the mounting tide of cineastes. Dotting the suburbs outside Madrid are filmland chateaux complete with heated swimming pools. It all adds up to an outsized film community and a sweeping trend that makes Madrid the pace setter for Hollywood production abroad.

While Samuel Bronston remains the chief figure and long-range production programmer, a host of other film-makers are at work in the Spanish capital city with projects already before cameras or with plans to get into operation in coming months.

Staying On

With Bronston's "The Fall of the Roman Empire" heading toward completion in July, almost all of the stars in the big cast with the exception of Sophia Loren, will subdivide to star under their own production banners on the plains of Spain. Alec Guinness as a top-billed performer, and Anthony Quayle as director, will team with screenwriter Graham Greene to roll "The Living Room" in association with Alan Brown. Stephen Boyd and scripter Clark Reynolds, with the help of legal packager Herb Brenner, have at least two projects almost ready for the day Rome falls. John Ireland is actively preparing "Viva Gringo" from the Borden Chase book and script for his own JBI flagship, but this project could be delayed if, as it now appears, Ireland will play the male lead in "The Living Room." Mel Ferrer will star in the religious biopic "La Salle" for Eurofilms in an arrangement that gives him a producer associate status as well. Producer-star James Mason has a program of his own to be filmed beyond Spanish borders, but would stay to film in Spain at the drop of a sombrero, if the right property came along.

Bronston was the pioneer and stays the pacesetter. During the course of filming "John Paul Jones," "King of Kings," "El Cid," and "55 Days at Peking," he has developed a sturdy organization that includes a roster of Hollywood and mixed nationality staffers, a completely functional three-stage studio, 150 acres of exterior-set terrain 25 kms from Madrid, and a giant investment production program that now appears to be lined up through 1965.

While Bronston has set Frank Capra's "Circus" for possible filming in Italy the early part of September, "Roman Empire" spanned seven-month (Jan. to July) shooting in Spain under Anthony Mann. Sophia Loren, Stephen Boyd, Alec Guinness, James Mason and Christopher Plummer, Anthony Quayle, John Ireland, Mel Ferrer and Omar Sharif are in the cast. His next big one for Spain is "Paris 1900," to go the early part of next year. After that, the schedule calls for "The French Revolution" and "Isabel of Spain."

Pending final contract signatures, Miss Loren has said "si" to Bronston for the "Isabel" title role. All will be multimillion dollar productions designed for family entertainment "not only for present generations but for those still to come." With Bronston's story development offices open for business in New York, London, Paris and Madrid, some of the projects in blueprint could shift in time. Probably not "Paris 1900," for which David Niven has been committed in a starring role and Vittorio de Sica signed as director.

Ray Goes Spanish

Once Rome-based, Nicholas Ray decided to set up shop in Madrid after he finished directing "55 Days at Peking" for Bronston last year. He organized Leo Productions and is now embarked ambitiously in developing four to five screen properties as producer-director, as producer, or simply as director. Now in work is "Next Stop Paradise" based on a novel by Polish refugee Mirch Hlasko. Screenplay will be written by Hlasko and Ray for production this year. Ray will produce and direct. Next, will be Nick Ray-Lars Schmidt coproduction starring Ingrid Bergman with locations in Norway and sound staging in Spain. Project is now getting title clearance. Another property is a novel called "Memoirs of a Medico" to be done entirely in Spain with Ray producing only. Final project on Spanish boards is "Mimi." The active film planner is hopeful Ava Gardner will star in one of his pix. Between times, Ray will direct "The Road to the Snail" and possibly "On the Road" for producer Alan Brown.

For Alan Brown, "The Living Room" is just a debut backed by sound Spanish financing and supported by a corps of experienced production staffers, assembled from personal contacts made during his associate producership on "John Paul Jones," "King of Kings" and "55 Days at Peking." With "Living Room," he will throw his independent hat in the ring with an initial series of three projects. Second, which could go before "Living Room," is the remake of a 16-year-old-Spanish classic called "El Hombre en el Camino" (On the Road), which he plans to film in the untouched scenic backdrop of the Picos de Europa with an Int'l cast. "Road to the Snail" will go early next year under the direction of Nick Ray. Nicholas Phipps, who screenplayed the popular British "Doctor . . ." features as well as "Captain's Paradise," is now in Madrid completing a first draft.

The Case of Yordan

In a continuing relationship with Bronston, Phillip Yordan has played a prominent part in all of the big ones Bronston has made since "King of Kings." As producer in his own right, heading up Security Pictures, he has brought in production exec Lester Sansom to help him organize a multiple picture-making program from headquarters in Madrid. Many of the films will be made in Spain. Some will be outright Security Pictures product; others will be done in c[illegible]roduction with Spanish companies. Provisional headquarters opened last month on the Gran Via, the Spanish capital city's Film Row. Of the ten films Security Pictures will produce for Allied Artists distribution in the Western hemisphere, Yordan and Sansom are pushing final screenplays on "Grotto" based on an Erskine Caldwell novel; "The Tribe that Lost its Head," from a Nicholas Monsarrat tome; a bigger than average sci-fi tinter, "Crack in the World," and a wide-screen Western in color, "Red Man's River." Yordan plans to have first of the four in production here this summer.

George Sherman is another Hollywoodite settling in Madrid. He jumped off last month as director of "Wounds of Hunger," a WOH Productions starring Luciana Paoluzzi, Tony Anthony, Mark Damon and Brad Talbot. Anthony and Talbot are producing this one with Prescott Rathborne from a Matthew Andrews script about young bullfighters. "Wounds of Hunger" started out to be a coproduction with Hispamex packaged by Jack Lamont, but inconsistent viewpoints between the two companies scrapped it as a coproduction and it is now before cameras as an American project. George Sherman has producer-director plans for Spain and plans to base in Madrid for approximately three years of film-making activity.

Others Like Spain

Jack Lamont, on the other hand, will go it alone in a continued association with Hispamex for coproduction of two Westerns "The Grass Is Red" and "Kid Rodelio," each of which would involve Hollywood screen talent.

Sidney Pink is another Yank producer with a multiple film-making program for coproduction in Spain. After filming "El Valle de las Espadas" (The Castilian) mostly on location near Burgos last year as a coproduction with M. D. Films, he now has a coproduction going with Esamer Films which stars Barry Sullivan and Martha Hyer in "Fuego" (Pyro) from a script he wrote with Luis de los Arcos. The suspense horror pic will be released by American International. Coming up next is an SWP Films-Esamer co-venture, "Vanilla, Chocolate and Strawberry," a musical written and to be directed by Fred Finklehoffe with a cast starring Frankie Avalon, Donald O'Connor and Deborah Walley. Third on the '63 schedule is "Invisible City" which, pending approval of script written by Sidney Pink, will star Lana Turner, Barry Sullivan, Cesar Romero, Tuesday Weld, Jack Krushen and Hoagy Carmichael, for filming mid-September. Before the year ends Pink hopes to have "Unknown Galaxy" in the works. Pink will write the script for this one from his own original story and no cast has yet been set. Slated to appear in all or most SWP-Esamer pix is young Spanish Southland beauty, Soledad Miranda, who signed a seven-year pact with Pink after her debut in "The Castilian."

Indie packager Niels Larsen, with "Savage Guns" and the Eddie Constantine starrer "Money to Burn" to his credit, has rigged up a German-Spanish-Italian coproduction, "The Last 100 Hours" for filming this month or next with Jeff Hunter playing the lead under Gerd Oswald's direction. "100 Hours" will be followed by "Walls of San Cimone" which Hollywood's Bern-Field Productions here will coproduce for Universal release with John Saxon and possibly Rosanna Schiaffino playing the leads for director Hugo Fregonese. Larsen also lists an untitled comedy set in Europe with John Gavin starring and "Broken Gate" to be filmed on exterior in Beirut and on interiors in Spain with a Hollywood star to be topbilled.

Although the bulk of Hollywood film production in Spain falls into the growing category of long-range programming, a number of one-shot projects should be noted.

One-Shotters

Charles Schneer, who is more familiar with low-budget operations in Spain than most producers after filming "The Seventh Voyage of Sinbad," "The Three Worlds of Gulliver" and "Mysterious Island," will bring in director Jerry Juran in May to shoot "The First Man in the Moon," at Sevilla Studios.

Laurence Harvey laid the ground work for a return visit to Spain while he was producing, directing and starring in "The Ceremony" early this year. His plans for 1963 include "Talent for Loving" which he and Martin Shute will produce here from a Richard Condon screenplay. The project will go into production after Harvey finishes his starring role in "Of Human Bondage."

Spanish exteriors of Fred Zinnemann's "25th Hour" starring Gregory Peck, Anthony Quinn and Omar Sharif might have to be scrapped unless the producer-director submits a script Spanish authorities will approve. Film contains delicate political overtones dating back to the Spanish War. Location shooting in the Pyrenees north of Pamplona was scheduled for May.

Lester Welch has been surveying the local situation for the past several months and finally pacted with Tecisa to coproduce a Western under the direction of Roy Roland with Richard Harrison playing one of the lead roles.

Robert Lippert has also scouted production and location facilities in recent months and is reported as a likely producer possibility to film a pair of Westerns on the Spanish steppes.

Dave Diamond, partnered with Samuel Bischoff, was in last month to set the Gertrude and George Fox screenplay, "Brandy," for production in Spain and to rig a Spanish-Italian coproduction for "La Bella Capri."

Jack Miles took "Face of Terror," a horror adventure flicker, back to the Coast for marketing and will seek out financing for his projected "Red Camel," a story of the Spanish foreign legion to be shot on Western Sahara locations and on Madrid sound stages.

This VARIETY survey does not incorporate grapevine reports, but is based on information directly received by the principals listed; nor does it include Spanish coproductions with other European filmmakers in which a number of Hollywood actors, headed by Jayne Mansfield, are being signed for starring roles.

U.S. film production in Spain is nothing new. In fact, it has been in progress for eight years dating back to "Alexander the Great," the first to be made completely on exteriors and in Spanish studios. However, there were few instances of more than one or two Yank pix in production at the same time.

This year, Hollywood-on-the-Manzanares comes to life in no uncertain terms. With Bronston contributing the major gravitating pull as well as a manpower and talent reservoir that encourages on-the-spot possibilities for independent U.S. production and coproduction, The Spanish capital city sparkles with the filmdom look of the future.

PEDRO BALANA, MAN BARCELONA WATCHES

Barcelona.

Barcelona has two new film houses, the Regio Palace, 2,000 seats, and the Aribau, 1,000. They are the freshest evidence of the expanding circuit of Pedro Balana. This showman is now the dominant individual in exhibition hereabouts. He controls these additional first-runs: Coliseum, Tivoli, Novedades, Alcazar, Borras and Diagonal. His Principal Palace and Cine Avenida rate as secondruns.

So enlarged and threatening has become the Balana chain that the other theatre operators here may be said to form a union for fear they will awaken to find themselves shut out of bargaining for the best releases. Balana in turn is staffing for the struggle which is bound to grow keener. Two newcomers to his organization are Jose Rovira Padulles as sales manager and Juan Falceto as publicity manager.

SPAIN REORGANIZES ITS FILM BIZ

By HANK WERBA

Madrid.

The Spanish government's sweeping reorganization of its film policies, initiated by incoming Minister of Information Fraga Iribarne last summer has gotten off to an unusually positive start under the Minister's personally - designated Director General for Cine in, Garcia Escudero. Together, they formed a 53-member State Film Council, seating representatives from every branch of motion picture making, as well as from ministries and institutes related in one way or another to the film industry.

This Film Council was soon broken down into working committees that have already helped bring into being (1) a new film code, (2) an edict, to encourage the production and importation of films for minors, (3) an edict listing new age brackets for films and film audiences, as well as the pending statutes governing future programming of uncensored original-version movies for selective adult audiences.

One working committee, dealing with "economic affairs," is the key group in the Film Council, and is not expected to submit recommendations to film authorities for some months to come. The reason is simple: within its jurisdiction, this committee is groping with the heart and anatomy of the film industry itself. Up for consideration, for example, are such vital matters as

1) Credit for film production programs in film companies and in companies employing foreign capital financing.

2) State aid program—via outright classifications, or a combination of boxoffice percentage subsidies plus quality subsidies or indiscriminate aid based on approved budget cost plus quality subsidies.

3) Boxoffice control — either partial control starting with Spanish films or total boxoffice control.

4) Import licenses — free trade or quota.

5) Dubbing licenses—unlimited or restrictive.

6) Import and dubbing fees — elimination, or sharp reduction.

7) Distribution—continued use of the Eurema point system or free trade. Added item under this heading is special consideration for U. S. distribs in Spain.

8) Four-to-one protective formula.

9) Obligatory screen time for Spanish pix.

10) Coproductions.

11) Foreign capital investment—in companies and in individual film projects.

12) Foreign product in Spain.

The working committee considering this basket of fundamental film industry policies is a small one but composed of the following leading film figures: Victoriano Lopez Garcia, technical head of National Film Institute; Jesus Orfila, film expert representing the Commerce Ministry; Farre de Calzadilla, Entertainment Sindicato chief; Manuel Goyanes, for the producers; Vicente Salgado, president of the Sindicato's National Economic Film Board; Antonio Cuevas, for the producers, Jesus Miguel Hermaechea, for the film documentary producers; Joaquin Agusti, president of the Spanish Distributors' Assn; Vicenti Guilla, president of the Spanish Exhibitors' Assn; Vizcaino Casas film legalist; Jose Maria Alonso-Pesquera, head of the film corps, and Jose G Maesso.

Recommendations and proposals of this committee are in turn submitted to the permanent committee of the State Film Council. In addition to Lopez Garcia, Calzadilla, Orfilla, Goyanes, Agusti and Guilla, the permanent group includes Juan Antonio Bardem, representing film directors, Alfonso Sanchez, representing the film critics, Antonio Penacoba, speaking for the film studios, Garcia Herranz, screenwriters rep; and Jose Suarez, president of the actors wing within the Entertainment Sindicato.

Information Minister Fraga Iribarne and Director General for Cinema Garcia Escudero are not entirely relying on the State Film Council to project important modifications in film policy and structure. The minister has already submitted an outline of film industry reform incorporating his viewpoints and those of the director general. The State Film Council, the permanent committee guiding its work and the working committee laboring over this outline have been essentially created for consultation. Nonetheless, the importance of these committee members within the industry and their individual level of professional qualifications give the impression that committee proposals will not fall on deaf ears.

The minister and his director general are men of action endowed with a fairly specific vision of the shape they would like to see the film industry take. They are counting on the film council and designated committees to support major reforms, but they also require sound professional advice as a precaution against confusion and discontent that could jeopardize the radical readjustment their short and long-range plans entail.

'International Market' Signifies Hispania Only to Many Stars

Madrid.

Most of European countries, including Finland, have uncovered film stars who have traveled the success route all the way to Hollywood, or have acquired sufficient stardom in their own back yards to bring Hollywood to their doorsteps. Italy has its Sophia Loren, who this year joined Liz Taylor to pocket a million per pic. Italy also has Gina Lollobrigida and Claudia Cardinale. Brigitte Bardot has not plied her trade in Hollywood only because she can ply it more happily on the Continent. Germany has Romy Schneider and Cristina Kaufmann, who are both up in the big leagues on both sides of the Atlantic.

How about Spain? The best that can be said for Spanish stars is that a small number, not more than the fingers on one hand, have broken through local confines to establish a fan beachhead on Latin American shores. But not one has come forward to acquire Int'l fame or the status Hollywood considers indispensable for its star roles.

Spanish screen talent had an opening 30 years ago when Hollywood imported Castilian stars to dub Yank pix for the Latino market. Maria Fernanda Ladron de Guevara, Luana Alcaniz, Jose Nieto and Julio Pena never really developed roots on the West Coast and returned to Spain.

Two Spanish film stars of recent date also got as far as the Yank film capital, but no further. Sarita Montiel starred in "Vera Cruz" with Gary Cooper and Burt Lancaster, and in "Serenade" with Mario Lanza and Joan Fontaine. Shortly after, she returned home and soared to Spanish-language fame by singing a dozen tunes in a cuple melter, "El Ultimo Cuple." Since then she has repeated the cuple formula in half-a-dozen song-along features that have done nothing for her career but net her and her producers gold-lined returns at home and south of the Rio Grande.

Carmen Sevilla travelled all the way to Hollywood for the English dubbing of her star role with Richard Kiley in "Spanish Adventure." But her star at Paramount Studios bore no fruit except for a costarring role five years later in "King of Kings."

Several others went West on long and short term contracts, but none triumphed.

It would be inaccurate to conclude that screen acting talent is not one of the Spanish attributes. A realistic explanation for Spain's retarded film stars is the fact that there is no industry behind the many hopefuls who compete for the key light year after year. Spanish film circles have lacked the corps of directors and writers basic to any formative influence. Spanish film-makers, in the main, budget between $50,000 and $100,000 per project, with little or no possibility of attracting Int'l interest to cast or product.

In an industry seeking to come abreast of film success in neighboring lands, Spanish producers and government film officials are trying to tackle one of the fundamental local goals—the encouragement and training of top talent for eventual stardom in both hemispheres.

Samuel Bronston Now In Command of Completest Studio Setup in Spain

Madrid.

Samuel Bronston's acquisition of Chamartin Studios, the rental of a Sevilla Studio sound stage for live television production and the destruction by fire over a year ago of Orphea Studios in Barcelona, are some of the major developments affecting film studios in Spain.

Bronston Studios are now by far the most complete film-making installation in this country. It includes three sound stages, one of which is as large and as modern as any on the Continent. The studio grounds contain a sprawling backlot and several villas, each allocated to individual directors and staff for projects in preparation. The main studio building holds two floors of executive and department offices, a closely-knit group of cutting rooms, a modern projection room, and two restaurants. Close by dependancies include carpentry, plaster, prop, grip, camera and electrical shops.

Sevilla and CEA Studios are still primarily in a four-wall rental operation with the average cost of a large sound stage, around $365 a day, including a work crew of 10 with chief. Sevilla's sound stage No. 3, measuring 3600 sq ft., will continue to be on rental to Television Espanola for the next several years. Sevilla and CEA offer about the same capacity, although the latter has no backlot, while Sevilla boasts the biggest outdoor studio shooting area in Spain.

The loss of Orphea Studios gave rise to various reports of new projects for studio construction in Barcelona and outlying regions. The one most likely to succeed, in which former Orphea owners Aragonese and Puyol are partnered with the Balcazar Brothers and Madrid-based Catalan producer Jorge Tusell, has the approval of Barcelona authorities and government film officials to construct a million dollar four-stage studio with all modern appurtenances near the ex-Orphea site in the Catalan capital's Montjuich Park.

The loss of Orphea revived an old studio, Buch-Sanjuan, and there is talk that this plant will undergo immediate expansion to cope with the increasing demand for stage space. There is further speculation that veteran film producer and studio owner Ignacio F. Iquino will abandon his Madel T studio and build a new and bigger film-making edifice in the Barcelona suburbs.

Madrid-Barcelona Directors: Newcomers Sans 'New Wave' Poses

Spain.

"Careful—Youth at Work." This is the signpost that most aptly describes the distinguishing trend on the local film scene. It not only signals the landrush of film school graduates from lecture halls into a front-line baptism of fire in acting, directing and 'tecnicos,' but it also marks the responsive atmosphere for young and debuting filmites created under the nine-month regime by Director General for Cinema Garcia Escudero and his boss, Minister of Information Fraga Iribarne.

A quick look at the roundup of Spanish film production for 1963 release constitutes a barometer to measure the extent of youth activity in film-making that started last fall when the government's relaxed censor policy cleared a batch o. screenplays previously banned and okayed others that, under the old film regime, would have been banned or shelved indefinitely.

No less than 14 young film directors turned in their initial film feature since Garcia Escudero took office, and more than a half dozen promising directors with one or two credits at the most, were also at work to emphasize Spain's new, dynamic accent on youth.

Many of the newcomers owe their inspiration to the three "B's" of Spanish film-making—Berlanger, Bardem and Bunuel, three hard-hitting nonconformist writer-directors who have, without question, most strongly influenced the oncoming generation. Berlanger and Bardem were the first of the Film Institute graduates to achieve success at home and abroad. Marco Ferreri, an Italian director who found a niche in this country until pre-Escudero censors left him with no choice but that of returning to Rome, should be bracketed with the others. They proved that stimulating, quality product based on strictly national themes and locales should and could make an impact at top film festivals as well as in foreign markets. They helped break the mold of typical Spanish films that were being ground out mainly for subsidy classification and home consumption.

First Timers

Notable first films, some of which are already being hailed as solid achievements include "The Dynamiters" directed by Juan Antonio; the Perez Dolz pic "Encounter with Death;" Jose Luis Marino's "Highway to the Stars," Isidoro Ferry's musical "Hi-Fi Landing." The Eddie Constantine starrer "Money to Burn" directed by Jose Luis Monter; the promising Ramon Comas entry "New-Found Friends," the highly-touted Manuel Summers' "From Pink . . . to Yellow;" "El Buen Amor," Spanish designation for the Cannes Film Fest, directed by Francisco Regueiro; Spain's entry at Mar del Plata "Summer Nights," helmed by Jorge Grau; the sturdy effort by Arturo Gonzalez Jr. "Be Good My Brother;" the honorably mentioned "K dnapping of T. T.," directed by Jose Louis Viloria; and Jose Maria Zabalza's "The Sound of Silence."

Now filming for the first time are Jose Luis Gamboa with "Games for Men." Jose Luis Font turning cameras on "Family Life," and writer-director Jesus Fernandez Santos who is shooting "Drive for Achievement." Almost ready to enter production are Angel Picazo's "Aunt Tula" based on a story by Miguel de Unamuno and Antonio Mercero's "Trotin the Street Trotter" Francisco Prosper, a veteran set constructor turned film-maker, has "Confessions of a Husband" in post-production editing.

Of the films scheduled for immediate production, the most ambitious is "Jose Maria el Tempranillo" which will mark Carlos Saura's second film assignment. His first, "Juvenile Delinquents" represented Spain at Cannes last year. Maria Camus will make his entrance before cameras to direct "Holiday's End" from his own screenplay. Another promising beginner, Juan Estelrich, is now preparing "Lenten Concert." Antonio Cortes will bow with "Summer in Mallorca" and Gustavo Perez Puig will leave stage lights for a first film try with "Waiting Room."

There is no glib talk here of a "new wave." There is rather a feeling that this burst of onrushing youth will primarily produce a rupture with tradition and attempt to mow down conservative hostions, mainly social, but melded with political and psychological tangents. Many of the new productions will be low-budget entries costing anywhere from $50,000 to $100,000. A good number of the projects will be largely filmed on exteriors and often with nonprofessional casts. The focus will more than likely be on Spain itself—its people, customs, habits, modes and thinking. The new product will, in the main, pass as strong fare, discriminatingly and intelligently conceived, slanted for adult world audiences.

More likely than not, young-image film directors will continue to find roadblocks set up from various quarters. They will have to buck the high and the mighty in many areas of Spanish life where modern ideas and problems are synonymous with subversion. They will also encounter difficulties in the local market, where the audience tradition is linked with entertainment rather than with think pix; although there have been encouraging signs of boxoffice interest in Ingmar Bergman, a few French new wavers and some trail-blazing Italians during the past year. Adult Yank pix, such as "Sweet Bird of Youth," "Splendor in the Grass," "Walk on the Wild Side," "Two Weeks in Another Town," "Piedra" and "Five Finger Exercise" are also helping audiences to grow out of lightweight film fare in preparation for more mature native films in the home market.

Bardem and Berlanger are already at work on their current projects—"Nothing Ever Happens" and "The Executioner." Bunuel is preparing "The Tristana" undampened in any way, despite virulent opposition here to his still-unclassified unreleased "Viridiana." The upcoming motion picture panorama in Spain will provide the opportunity of measuring to what extent the oathbinders are still calling the tunes.

SPANISH FEATURES FOR 1963 RELEASE

AGATA Juan Atienza greems as director with "The Dynamiters," and an upbeat word-of-mouth in film circles has raised expectancy for this AGATA production coproduced with Films Columbus of Rome. Starring are Pepe Isbert, Sara Garcia and Carlo Pisacane.

AGATA topper Jose Luis Dibildos joins with Champion of Rome and Circe of Paris for "Cyrano and D'Artagnan," directed by Abel Gance with a cast culled from the three coproducing nations, but headed by Hollywood's Jose Ferrer and Dhalia Lavi. Laura Valenzuela, Agata contract star, Rafael Riveiles and Julian Mateos are Spanish-cast stars.

ALBATROS Young director Jesus Franco readily admits the Hitchcock influence in his previous films and in his current "The Hand of a Dead Man," a Hispano-French coproduction starring Hugo Blanco, Howard Vernon, Paula Martel, Ana Castor, Charles Dullin and Goge Rojo.

ANABEL Veteran director Saenz de Heredia joins popular playwright Alfonso Paso in adapting the legit hit "Rights of Woman" to the screen with Mara Cruz, Javier Armet, Jose Luis Lopez Vazquez and Amelia de la Torre heading the cast for this modern Spanish take-off on the Lysistrata theme. A thought-provoking entry with a social wallop beneath the spoofing.

ANTARES Pedro Lazaga directs a big cast of Spanish stars in "Weekend," a romantic comedy with Antonio Ozores, Jose Luis Lopez Vazquez and Manuel Gomez Bur providing the laughs while lovely young promise Soledad Miranda, Angela Bravo and Enrique Avila accent romance.

APOLO Producer-director Antonio del Amo makes with music and pleasant comedy in "The Twins," a lightweight production destined for local salles.

ARGOS Director Ramon Fernandez has bright young singer Li Morante starring in "I aim at the Stars," a musical vie en rose.

ATECA "Eva 63" directed by Pedro Lazaga, is a modern romantic comedy with a cast loaded with Spanish stars including Laura Valenzuela, Elisa Montes, Jorge Rigaud, Angel Ter, Angela Bravo, Elvira Quintilla, Enrique Avila and Soledad Miranda.

BALCAZAR Seasoned assistant director Perez Dolz takes over the reins for "Encounter with Death," recently completed in Barcelona with a cast headed by Jose Suarez, Luis Pena and Maria Asquerino.

BOSCO Producer, director and star Anna Mariscal is a one-woman show in "Occident and Sabotage," an adventure thriller with political overtones.

CASTILLA Antonio Roman directs "Pact of Silence," a mystery thriller in which his wife Yvonne Bastien stars with Pierre Brice and Carlos Estrada.

CONSTELLATION Action and adventure mark "Twisted Paths," a Catalan coop production directed by Antonio Santillan and starring Marta Padovan, Victor Valverde and Gerard Tichy.

COPERCONES Active cooperative film banner places Spain-based, muscled Yank actor Richard Harrison at the top of a costumed cast for "Perseus and Medusa" in coproduction with Italy.

Cuban actor Rene Munor, now a fulltime resident in Madrid, follows his big success in "Friar with a Mop" in a dramatic tale laid in Wild West surroundings, titled "Welcome Padre Murray." Ramon Torrado directs.

DELFIN "Highway to the Stars," directed by Jose Luis Marino is a eulogy to those who fought for France. Leading roles are played by Manuel Gil, Susana Canales, Julio Pena, Matia Blanco, Alfredo Mayo, Rhomas Blanco and Jose Nieto.

DOCUMENTO "Hi-Fi Landing" is an ambitious song and dance musical with an Int'l cast numbering Don Mitland (son of Ray), Yank Dorothy Peterson, Germaine Damar, Argentina's Perla Cristal and a big Spanish cast topped by Arturo Fernando, Casero, Jose Rubino and Angel del Pozo.

EPOCA Luis Lucia directs popular teenage warbler Rocio Durcal in "Miss Rocio of La Mancha" for Spanish-language masses in a song and folklore tableau also starring Carlos Estrada and Helga Line.

ESTE Partnered with Italy in "World Spectacles" with Jose Nunez directing. No story or cast; just a collection of ballet and circus acts.

CESAREO GONZALEZ "Malaga Nights," directed by veteran Rafael Gil, melds bullfighting and tourism on the Sun Coast. El Cordobes, a hair-raising fighter of three-year-old bulls, who recently earned his matador stripes, heads a cast that includes Argentina star Alberto de Mendoza, Elena Balduque, Maria Anderson and Monola Moren. Early reports hint a wider b.o. appeal than just the Spanish lingual market.

HESPERIA Carlos Couret coproduces "Holdup at Three" with his scriptwriter Pedro Maso, and Jose Maria Forque directs the action comedy with a sure hand. The antics of Jose Luis Lopez Vazquez, Cassen and Gracita Morales makes "Holdup" one of the solid boxoffice hits this year and a strong entry for the Spanish-lingo market.

HISPAMER Energetic producer Sergio Newman stars Guy Rieckwell (Dean's brother) and statuesque Andalucian, Mikaela, in "Three Swords of Zorro" in coproduction with RODES of Italy under Ricardo Blasco's direction.

Eddie Constantine is a Yank who made good as a two-fisted, hard-hitting, shirt-chasing, undercover operative. He stars in this Hispano-French coproduction "Spider's Web," which marks Jose Luis Monter's bow as director. Elisa Montes, Jose Nieto and Mayra Ray round out the cast.

HISPAMEX Ramon Comas initiates his career as director with "New-Found Friends," one of several new-wave films now blossoming forth with government censor relaxation. The film was one of five candidates as the Spanish entry at the Cannes Film Festival. Cast includes many newcomers, among which: Maria Andersen, Angela Brave and Mer Casas.

IFI Young Catalan director Jose Maria Forn takes his "Narcotic Trails" through Barcelona port cities and Pyrances mountain roads with a cast of newcomers headed by Victor Valverde, Patricia Lujan and Angel Lamberte.

Two new chirping teenagers, Maribel Ayuso and Juan Jose lead the cast in "Devil with an Angel," a comedy plus tunes which Miguel Lluch directs.

Jose Maria Forn brings a popular Spanish brigand out of mothballs for "Jose Maria," starring Rafael Baldassarre, Fernando Sancho and Victor Valverde.

"Pay the Assassin" Miguel Lluch directs this action thriller for producer Iquino with a cast headed by Julian Mateos.

IMPALA A new producer, Saiz de Vicuna, coproduces the Jules Verne "The Glorious Rebel" with Spanish, French and Italian copartners. The cast, under the direction of Georges Lampin, is headed by Luis Jourdan, Francisco Rabal, Bernard Blier, Serena Vergano and Valeria Fabrizi.

IMPALA co-ventures with ECHO Films for a highly touted new-wave entry, "From Pink . . . to Yellow," directed by debuter Manuel Summers, still clutching his Film Institute diploma. No point in listing the cast; it is non-pro. Pic is among nominees to represent Spain at Cannes.

JET Producer Alfredo Matas practically took on all of the graduating class of the official Film Institute for "El Buen Amor" and has turned up a solid contender as the Spanish entry for Cannes. Francisco Bequeiro directs his first film; in front of cameras, fresh starlets Simon Andreu, Maria del Val, Maria Carballeira and Francisco Guijar head the youthful cast.

JUBO Producer-director Julio Coll won the San Juan Bosco Oscar for helming his previous film, "Dress Rehearsal for Murder," and is back with another thriller "Laberynth," starring Javier Escriva, Luis Prendes, Alberto Dalbes and May Heatherly.

LAPONIA Debuting director Jorge Grau has come through with an Int'l hit in "Summer Nights," starring Francisco Rabal, Catherine Spaak and Maria Cuadra. LAPONIA, on its first try, has already been honored by official designation of "Summer Nights" as the Spanish entry at Mar del Plata. Executive producer Jose Maria Otero had PROCUSA backing in this coproduction with Dominicana of Italy.

LLAMA Lee Ancheric, Gerard Tichy and Helga Line star in "Horror," with Alberto de Martino directing.

MARTA Arturo Gonzalez Jr. has a sturdy cast to work with in his first try as director. "Be Good My Brother" stars Fernen Gomez, Carmen Bernardos, Antonio Fernandez and Felix Fernandez.

MEDEGA Coproducing with APO Film of Rome and Diel-france of Paris, Hugh O'Brian stepped in when John Gavin bowed out of "Assassins" to star with Cyd Charisse, Eleanora Rossi Drago and Alberto Closas under the direction of Sylvio Amadio.

BENITO PEROJO When Perojo went shopping for a singing star to replace former contractee Sarita Montiel, he signed Jon Maruja Diaz for "Chaste Susanna." Luis Amadori is skilled a songalog musicals in a mellow setting; cast is a sturdy one. Film is a remake of one Benito Perojo originally directed in Argentina a decade or more ago. Censors found too much exposure on first vision but later approved it with cuts. A good bet for the Spanish-language market, opened for this type of screen entertainment by Sarita Montiel.

PEROJO coproduces "The Vagabond Tourist" with Sono Films of Argentina. Enrique Cahen Salaberry directs; Jose Marrone, Juanjo Menendez, Graziia Morales, Alfredo Mazo star.

Isasi-Isasmandi directs "The Mask of Scarmouch," a three-way coproduction with FIDES of Paris and C.C.M. of Rome. Cast is headed by Gerard Barray, Alberto de Mendoza, Helga Line, Michelle Girandon, Gianna Maria Canale and Jorge Rigaud.

ORDUNA Producer-director Juan de Orduna tackles "Heat Before the Storm" after his success with "Santa Teresa," substituting a dramatic narrative for his successful religioso biopic. Maria Mahor stars.

PICASA Coproducing with TESTA of Buenos Aires where "The Law Stands Trial" is being directed by Spain's Agustin Navarro. Stars are Antonio Vilar and Olga Zubarry.

PRECISA Jose Luis Viloria is another Film Institute graduate off to a good start with "The Kidnapping of T. T." Film is under consideration as Spain's entry at Cannes.

PRODISA Young in years and short on credits, Jose Maria Zabalza is another beginner helming "The Sound of Silence," starring Jose Campos and Matilia Sandoval.

PROFILMS 21 New production banner has Argentine Tullio Demichelli directing "The Winners," a story of the dramatically sordid beginnings of young bullfighters in the novilliere minor league. The cast is young; some fresh out of the Film Institute. Worth watching.

TECISA Producer Jose Maesso ventures into a major coproduction with Italy and France for "Scheherezade," a big Thousand and One Nights costumer directed by Gallic Pierre Gaspar Huit with a big Continental cast starring Anna Karina, Gerard Barray, Antonio Vilar, Jorge Mistral, and Fernanda Ray. Anna Karina offers an abundance of hip and grind as part of a spectacle entry visual in flesh and Damascus trappings.

Jose Maesso joins with JOLLY Film of Italy for "The Motorists," produced in Italy with Nino Manfredi and Ugo Tognazzi sharing cast honors with Spanish star Mercedes Alonso and Spanish comic Jose Luis Lopez Vazquez.

"Los Tarantos" is a Gypsy edition of Romeo and Juliet directed by Rovira Beleta with an all-Gypsy cast including Flamenco star Carmen Amaya.

TUSISA Another Catalan action thriller, "The Big Alibi" is directed by Jose Luis Madrid and stars Arturo Fernandez, Marisa de Leza and Argentine actor Luis Davila.

TYRYS "Torrejon City" is a parody on American Westerns directed by Spain-based Argentine director Leon Klimovsky with top Spanish comic Tony Leblanc backed by young Yank distaffer May Heatherly and vamp Mara Lasa.

UNION Mediterranean based U.S. actor Frank Latimore plays explorer Balboa and Pilar Caminos is the Indian maid waiting on shore in "Conquest of the Pacific."

WALKYRIA Javier Escriva plays the title role in "St. Isadore the Laborer," a religious biopic, under the direction of Rafael Salvia.

Sensible, Responsible Censoring Replaces Spain's Old Stiffness

Madrid.

Censorship has become a household word and a subject for quite discussion since Minister of Information Fraga Iribarne put his signature on a decree giving birth to Spain's first motion picture code. It was a foregone conclusion that this code would come under public scrutiny and it was also anticipated that debate of its merits and dangers would not always take place in a spirit of clarity and tranquillity.

Talk of a film code has been current for the past five years and several code committees labored fruitlessly during that period until the ministerial shakeup last year that brought Fraga Iribarne in as head of Information and Tourism with his subsequent designation of film-wise mover and shaker, Garcia Escudero, as Director General for Cinema.

Though the minister and his director-general were both actively involved in formulation of the code, the final text represents the efforts of a special 40-man committee within the State Film Council, which incorporates opinions of all branches of the film industry as well as the counsels of church leaders and ecclesiastics familiar with the problems and structure of the film industry.

At first glance the code is a 37 paragraph array of "Thou shalt not" and it is this general aspect that descended like a ton of wet clay on local and foreign observers. The immediate reaction was: "Is there anything not censorable worth showing on the screen?"

The difficulty in evaluating the published laws was the complete absence of ready standards of reference. As one news bureau chief put it: "I tried in vain to ascertain from official sources what criteria of censorship prevailed in the past." Others, unfamiliar with the background of film censorship during the past ten years, clubbed the code merely on the basis of the printed word.

Though this first set of printed ground rules contains many depressing restrictions and limitations, there are several well-founded reasons for judging it as a positive evolution in Spain's censor morality and policies.

First, film censorship is no longer an arbitrary, Kafka-like process administered by anonymous, politically-appointed civil servants and guidance-find commissions wielding full authority to decide yea and nay with no other basis for censor ratings than their own individual dogma and hobbies. Instead, the code now offers a framework of reason in which many prohibitions are right-clear and danger areas are at least substantially delineated. In addition, the code confines control to a government-appointed censor committee now composed of lay and ecclesiastical members, most of whom, for the time being at any rate, are modern in outlook and eager to help qualify Spanish films for both film festival awards and a competitive foothold in the world film market.

Looking at the code this censor group will be called on to interpret and administer in the coming future, the preface states that the document is only an outline of general principle to help orient code watchdogs as well as interested branches of film-making.

Under general principles, the first marks a departure with past practices by relegating what might appear to be offensive scenes or images to the overall film content. If the film as a whole is deemed "a serious danger," it will be banned; if not, it will be approved en toto, including its disturbing celluloid details.

Evil and immoral conduct will be tolerated on the screen as part of a dramatic conflict or compelling human behavior in specific circumstances. If they are ultimately rejected directly or indirectly before the film ends. In this respect, the code will not accept a moral reason to find film immoral, but calls for a substantial development in the script of a positive juxtaposition of good and evil.

The code also states that there is no valid reason to prohibit the presentation of "authentic problems" on the screen even when solutions are not forthcoming, but in such cases the censor verdict will depend on the film's final conclusion.

Threat To Family

Within this general framework, the code specifically rejects the justification of suicide, mercy killing, the spirit of vengeance (although admissible as a historic or geographic story point), divorce as an institution, adultery, illicit sexual relations, prostitution and, in general, anything that threatens marriage and family. Also prohibited is the justification of abortion and contraceptive methods.

The positive or negative application of the code will largely depend on censor interpretation of the word "justification." Heretofore these themes, or allusion to them, were unmentionable, and it required considerable camerawork double talk in the final dubbed dialog to camouflage such screenplay situations for the audience eye and ear. That is, when the more facile method of eliminating the situation from the print was not adopted. The word "justification" now lets many adult film themes and situations out of the silence chambers for screen treatment just so long as they are not condoned or sponsored as a life attitude.

No Sex Revolus

Prohibited outright in the filming or screening of sexual perversion as the principal story line, although possibly acceptable in secondary characters if related to a clear and predominantly moral conclusion. Also banned are the presentation of drug addiction or alcoholism; the presentation of crime attractively suggesting opportunities and methods of lawbreaking.

One clause protects the spectator by banning scenes that could incite his base passions; also, scenes denoting excessive brutality and cruelty to human beings and animals; morbid terror and, in general, film images that offend human dignity. Vulgarity that flies in the face of elementary good taste will also be banned.

The code defends religious beliefs and practices from irreverent mockery. It will also ban any snubbing or undignified criticism of political systems or ceremonies which should be treated respectfully by any normal standards of social order. In the same sense, provocative falsification of historical facts, figures and backgrounds will not be tolerated.

The code condemns any attitude favoring hatred between peoples, races or social classes. The principle of patriotism is inviolable.

No Disrespect

More specifically, the code bans any attack against the Catholic Church; the fundamental principles of State; internal and external security of the country; and the Chief of State.

A special clause makes the distinction between the broad film-going public and minority film audiences. For the latter, wide latitude is given to the censors in soft-pedaling application of the code throughout. This clause will also encompass special sales or art houses government authorities want the film industry to establish in principal cities only, to screen original version pix for adult audiences.

The criteria applied in a special section for youth under 14 cover the same ground but are infinitely more rigid in every sense.

A complementary group of regulations provides authority to ban titles that conflict with code clauses. It also provides the possibility, in doubtful cases, of approving a film intact by inserting a brief text explanation before titles. This text must be approved by the censor body.

Films are to be submitted for censorship without any prior cuts or modifications, although recommendations for certain changes can be forwarded to the censors. The code will be applied equally to foreign as well as national films and will also cover all scripts submitted for shooting permits.

This, therefore, is the censorship code which will govern the production, distribution and exhibition of motion pictures in Spain.

logs that have received popular support beyond all expectation.

Poorly stocked with film classics in the past, as compared to cinematheques in other countries, and facing bureaucratic obstruction at almost every step to become integrated internationally, Filmoteca Nacional finally received official support when ministerial changes brought Fraga Iribarne in to head up the Information Ministry. With Fraga's appointment of Garcia Escudero as Director General for Cinema, Cuenca was given the means and authority to organize screenings, both vintage and modern, as a primary effort to bulwark government interest in film education.

Cuenca boldly opened the new Filmoteca era with a five-program backlog of Antonioni films, previously missing from Spanish screens. The success was overwhelming. The 1,200-seat private salle in the social security was matched at both evening and late performances, and Cuenca was forced to augment with two additional sessions. Membership soon reached the 5,000 mark.

Upcoming series will be dedicated to Spanish director Florian Rey and to Frank Capra. Also projected is a series bringing to the Filmoteca screen all of the films directed by Eric Von Stroheim, including "The Merry Widow," "The Wedding March," "Greed," "Queen Kelly" and "Dance of Death."

Another aspect of Filmoteca programming will present a broad panorama of post Italian neorealism, featuring many films never before seen in Spain, directed by Visconti, Bergano, Castellani and De Santis.

Filmoteca Nacional has been serving as a clearing house for film product used by film clubs throughout Spain. The present inventory of only 300 pix is expected to be increased appreciably during 1963 as a result of all-out support film authorities are now prepared to render.

End B.O. Tax: Optimism In Sweden

HARRY SCHEIN CREDITED FOR WORKING OUT NEW BLUEPRINT TO SPUR INDUSTRY – PROVIDES SOME 'SELL' FOR SWEDISH PRODUCT ABROAD – LOOKS LIKE INGMAR BERGMAN, THE NATION'S CINEMATIC GLOBAL MAKEWEIGHT, DIVERTED TO LEGITIMATE THEATRE

By FREDERIC FLEISHER

Stockholm.

Hope and increased activity characterize the Swedish film industry for the first time in about a decade. A major reason for the more optimistic view is the recent proposal of the Swedish Minister of Finance, Gunnar Strang, to abolish the present 25% entertainment tax on boxoffice receipts. Consequently the state stands to lose an annual income of approximately $8,200,000 while the municipalities will lose $1,400,000.

In return for the abolishment of the entertainment tax, the film industry has agreed to lay aside 10% of the boxoffice receipts for the creation of a foundation to support "quality" production, to support publicity for Swedish films abroad, to educate and train technical and artistic talent and to support a number of other worthy film projects. The new plan is expected to go into effect on July 1.

The Swedish film industry has expressed delight over the new arrangement. Leading film men regard the removal of the entertainment tax as a final recognition of the artistic and cultural importance of the motion picture. Furthermore, the new conditions will enable the industry to increase and improve production. Producers will be able to experiment. Even though "quality" experiments may not break even at the boxoffice they will have a good chance of getting a substantial slice of the quality support awards.

Harry Schein Powered New Cultural Concept

The key man behind the Minister of Finance's proposal was Harry Schein, the 39-year-old husband of actress Ingrid Thulin. Schein, who came to Sweden as a refugee before World War II, is a chemist by profession who made his million on purifying water, while he wrote egghead film criticism for "Bonniers litterara magasin," Sweden's leading literary periodical. When Schein married Ingrid Thulin several years ago, he withdrew from criticism, sold his firm and devoted his energies to numerous cultural projects and managing his wife. His efforts played an important part in founding a municipal theatre in Stockholm. At present, Schein is working on plans to start a weekly magazine somewhat along the lines of The New Republic and Britain's The New Statesman and Nation.

A couple of years ago, Schein began working on ideas to improve the conditions of the film industry, actors and actresses, stage and film directors, authors, dancers, painters and other art groups. On May 1, 1962, Sweden's "cultural workers" made up an independent section of the annual May Day parade, which was headed by Schein and Ingrid Thulin, who was billed as a major speaker along with a number of leading Socialist politicians. Six months later Schein published a short book "Har vi rad med kultur?" (Can We Afford Culture?) in which he stated that the Social Democratic party had not fulfilled its cultural duties. In the foreword, Schein stated that the idea of writing the book had been largely stimulated by Ragnar Edenman, the Minister of the Ecclesiatics. Culture is a sub-division of the Ministry of the Ecclesiatics.

The proposals Harry Schein laid forth in his book for the film industry formed the basis of the recent proposal of the Minister of Finance. Several of Schein's suggestions concerning other areas of culture are also being adopted.

Schein did not settle for an entire removal of the entertainment tax because he felt that would only lead to increased profits for the theatre owners and major film companies that own theatre chains. The film producers would do less well than they do now. At present, the parliament divides $300,000 of the entertainment tax income between three to five outstanding Swedish "quality" productions.

With this in mind, Schein suggested that the industry should agree to turn over 10% of the boxoffice receipts, which at present would amount to approximately $2,400,000, to the different worthy projects.

Division of Monies: 5% O'Seas Publicity

The agreement between the industry and the government states that the 10% funds should be used in the following. (1) 30% is to be divided among Swedish "quality" features, children's films and shorts. The awards are to be made by a jury of qualified judges who are not associated with the industry. (2) 30% is to be distributed among Swedish producers. (3) 5% is to be used to promote projects of common interest to the industry, e.g. publicizing Swedish films abroad, arranging festivals, etc. (4) 30% is to be used for educating technical and artistic talent, instruction, research, providing school-teachers with a knowledge of the motion picture, the support of a film museum, etc.

The proposed agreement between the government and the film industry is planned to last 20 years. However, if cinema attendance drops by more than 15% during the next 10 years, the agreement can be cancelled.

As citizens are increasingly pushed into the suburbs, many complain that quality films are never shown in their area. Equally, there are seldom shown in many smaller communities. Consequently, a number of critics have suggested there should be municipal theatres for film showings just as there are for stage productions. Some sort of municipal-government support to theatres showing quality films may be a future project.

Swedish Features Fall From 30 to 13 in Year

Against this background, the Swedish film industry is hopefully making up plans for the future. Since the advent of television in 1956, cinema attendance has dropped about 35%. Production has sunk from 30 features a year to 13 last year. Producers have felt that they could not gamble on young or serious talent. Instead, money was put into modernizing theatres and building new ones, often in expanding suburbs.

Between 1956 and 1962 quality production has almost been synonymous with Ingmar Bergman who had gained international recognition in the nick of time. In 1960, the Swedish parliament lowered the entertainment tax on cinema tickets from 33 to 25%. It also put aside $200,000 annually—increased a year ago to 300,000—to be divided among the three to five outstanding quality productions. It was hoped that these moves would generate quality films.

The first effects became visible during 1962. The new trends were largely initiated by Ingmar Bergman who did not release a film during 1962. During a year and a half Bergman acted chief of production at Svensk Filmindustri and completed his own "Through a Glass, Darkly," "The Winter Light" and "The Silence." At the same time, Bergman produced his first film. The Bergman production introduced a new director, Vilgot Sjoman, a prominent novelist and critic who had written several screenplays.

Bergman believes that the film maker of the future will be his own script writer. He feels that dividing up the work between a writer and a director often complicates the process as the finished product is the result of two personalities. It is significant, therefore, that the first film that Bergman produced was written and directed by Vilgot Sjoman. "The Mistress" (Svensk Filmindustri), regarded the best Swedish film of '62 by most critics and film mag Chaplin, dealt with the problems of a young woman who was strongly attracted to a married man. Despite its technical quality and the qualified cast, which featured Max von Sydow and Bibi Andersson, VARIETY's critic found "The Mistress" rather long-winded and boring.

Swedish films released during 1962 demonstrated considerable technical skill, but often made an uninspiring and indifferent impression. The major boxoffice success was Kenne Fant's filmatization of Selma Lagerlof's classic "The Wonderful Adventures of Nils," which converted the charming story of a boy who traveled around Sweden with a flock of geese into a travelogue. People who want beautiful postcard pix of Sweden will find the film satisfying. Anyone who is familiar with Selma Lagerlof's imaginative saga will be disappointed.

Return to Productivity Of Kjellin, Hellstrom

Two veterans of the industry, Alf Kjellin and Gunnar Hellstrom, each directed their first Swedish production in several years. Kjellin directed a rather wordy feature, "Siska" (Svensk Filmindustri), which had been scripted by Vilgot Sjoman. It dealt with an interesting subject in an uninteresting manner. An emancipated young woman, a hospital intern portrayed by Harriet Andersson, felt her profession and her sex were in conflict. Neurotic Siska had problems from growing up in a male-dominated society, while her accidental acquaintance, Bo, suffered from being brought up by a dominating mother, a journalist who always viewed life from a slick, phoney female viewpoint. Rather than developing the personalities, the film discussed the problems and society.

Gunnar Hellstrom's "Chans" dealt with a teenage delinquent who was unable to liberate herself from a world of brutality and sex. Though the over-all impression was contrived and uninspired, the film had some powerful scenes. Another veteran, Arne Mattson, who has been directing mostly thrillers and light-weights in recent years, got a serious assignment when he directed "The Doll" (Reviewed in VARIETY Aug. 8, 1962).

A few days after it was revealed that Ingmar Bergman had been appointed head of the Royal Dramatic Theatre in Stockholm, his "The Winter Light" (reviewed in VARIETY March 20, 1963) opened. Bergman's next film "The Silence" is already in the can and scheduled for release in the autumn. There is a cast of 800 extras in the film. The story centers on two sisters and the son of one of them. The three people are on their way back to Sweden after spending their vacation abroad. They check into a hotel in a foreign city that is preparing for war. Bergman claims that in this film he depends more than ever on sound and pictures. He says there is 80 percent less dialogue in it than in any of his previous features.

Ironically, Bergman, who has been the industry's pride during the lean entertainment-tax years, will spend very little of his time in film studios now that grand plans are being made for the future. In May and June he will shoot his new color comedy. Afterwards he will devote most of his time to the Royal Dramatic Theatre, where he is planning numerous changes. Plans for a three part production, directed by Bergman, Fellini and Kurasowa have been shelved because of Bergman's appointment.

Stimulation Foreseen In Swedish Coproduction

According to the new agreement between the government and the industry, awards can be granted to Swedish quality productions or quality productions with a Swedish subject, a director or a Swedish star. This may stimulate co-productions, a favorite of Kenne Fant, the new president of Svensk Filmindustri. Possible co-productions being discussed include filmatizations of Selma Lagerlof's novel "Gosta Berling's Saga," which Mauritz Stiller lensed in 1924 with Lars Hanson in the title role and Greta Garbo in the supporting cast, and novelist Vilhelm Moberg's four novels about Swedish emigrants and their fate in the United States.

During the lean years, young Swedish talent has turned more and more to television, where many of the new or newer names got their training. Bengt Lagerkvist, a son of Nobel prize winner Par Lagerkvist, started in the theatre, but has been in the drama section of Swedish tv during the last few years. Hans Abramson got his first assignments as a director in tv, which he has left for films and theater. Ake Falck had directed films previously, but gained prominence through directing tv entertainment shows. Hans Lagerkvist went to tv during the lean film years. Gunnar Oldin, recently appointed chief of production at Europa, spent several years in the film section of tv and made numerous documentaries about film masters and masterpieces and current releases.

Bringing New Brains To Screenplay Writing

In general as Swedish television offers only 25 hours of viewing time weekly on one network, those who appear become names very quickly. About twice a month the greater part of an evening is devoted to televising a Swedish production of a play. The enormous publicity these productions receive in newspapers — which devote about a whole page daily to tv happenings—and the high viewer rating, the performers soon rate star billing anywhere else.

Another marked trend in the film industry is the interest in luring talented writers to films. Often Swedish film companies do not expect authors to submit a screenplay. They are satisfied with a fair length short story with dialogue. Last autumn, Svensk Filmindustri got together with two leading publishing houses and asked twenty Swedish authors—most of them had never written for films—to write a short story each. The stories are to be published in book form this autumn. Svensk Filmindustri has announced it has bought options on five of the stories.

Europa's first youthful quality production was "The Baby Carriage," written and directed by Bo Widerberg, a young novelist, journalist and film critic. Though Widerberg used big words in his articles and book on the stagnation within the industry, his film feature was not revolutionary. Widerberg called for features with contemporary themes. "The Baby Carriage" surrounds an 18 year old girl who gets picked up and pregnant, a story which has long been a favorite in Swedish films. Although Bergman's decade old "Summer With Monika" was far superior, Widerberg's "The Baby Carriage" shows considerable promise.

It is rather surprising that the so-called angry young men who are hammering on the doors of the industry often want to make films about youthful love and loneliness. Very few have an imaginative approach to the problems of married couples. Against this background and realization of the similarities between Sweden and Denmark, the Danish feature "Weekend" — a story about three rather affluent couples in their thirties who devote a summer weekend to sex entertainment—made a strong impact on Swedish audiences and critics. The Danes revealed a relatively unexplored, contemporary world.

Other authors who have recently been signed by the industry include SwedoFinn Jorn Donner, a novelist and film critic whose rather recent book about Ingmar Bergman is being translated into English, Lars Forsell, a poet and ballad writer, Par Radstrom, a novelist and critic and Bengt Soderbergh, a novelist and critic.

It remains to be seen how creative the new wave of optimism and opportunity that marks the Swedish film industry will be.

Denmark Slow to Slant Features For Foreign Playoff, But Some Do So

By MARK BENK

Copenhagen.

Despite the uncertainties caused by the Common Market discussions, more competition from television, falling boxoffice receipts and no letup in the entertainment tax which is still at a high 60%, Danish producers bravely keep producing.

Profits have not been automatic. More than ever before "made locally" does not automatically spell success in Denmark.

Surprisingly enough, there is not any very great attempt on the part of producers here to slant their product towards the international market even though they all realize they could use extra revenues. It is difficult to find out why producers are so shy of spreading their scope. Some suspect a national characteristic of underestimating Danish capabilities and the interest of the outside world in things Danish. Most producers express the opinion that the Danish language is a great barrier to foreign sales. Yet in the era of silent films this Kingdom competed with all the bigger producing nations.

Of course some recent Danish films have found success in the international market, in particular, "Harry and the Butler" made by Bent Christensen. He, without doubt, is doing more than anybody else to make good Danish pictures which can be sold outside of Denmark. His latest picture, "The Vacuum Cleaner Gang," recently premiered here in Copenhagen where it is boffo and has already been sold to a number of territories.

Younger producers have been getting all the limelight. Henning Carlsen, a very well known documentary man made his first full-length feature, "Dilemma," based on the novel "A World of Strangers" by Nadine Gordimer. Carlsen made this film "undercover" in South Africa and almost caused a diplomatic break between South Africa and Denmark. Film took first prize at the Mannheim Festival earlier this year and has been acclaimed by the critics as being outstanding. Carlsen and Christensen have great faith in the future of Danish pictures and from their record to date they seem to be on the right track.

Asa Films also had a very successful year with such pictures as "Bibi and Her Men" which has been sold to many countries. Asa is also aware of the importance of the international market and is presently planning a film to be shot partly in Kenya—the first Danish film to be made in that country. It will have an international cast and will be made in English as well as Danish. Asa is currently producing a film version of the popular English play, "The White Sheep of the Family."

The other Copenhagen studios are also busy—Nordisk has two films in production—Saga and Palladium will have several ready for the new season and Henrik Sandberg who has made the popular "Soldier Comrades" series starts yet another production early next month.

By the end of the year there will be about 20 new Danish films, which is still good going for a small country.

U.S. Films Big

In the theatres here, American product is still the favorite. "South Pacific" closed recently after a record run of four years. It was followed by "Oklahoma" which also seems set for a very long stay. Universal, distributed by Asa in Denmark, racked up lots of time with "Lover Come Back" and "Touch of Mink" both of which did top business. "Cape Fear" presently going the rounds has also provided some very good results.

"Breakfast at Tiffany's" was popular in Copenhagen—"West Side Story" went four months downtown and afterwards in several neighborhood runs. Then returned again to another first-run house in the city.

The outstanding recent success has been Metro's Cinerama's "How the West Was Won," now in its fifth month at the Kinopalaet. This is a relatively new theatre converted to three-projectors at a cost estimated at $200,000, possibly the best Cinerama theatre in Europe. It seats 1,100 and has a screen 100 feet wide.

Prior to "How the West Was Won" they ran Cinerama's "Seven Wonders of the World" for four months and only took it off to make way for the new picture.

TV Potent

Television is still having a very great effect on the takings and many exhibitors are very sore about the way in which American producers sell features to Danish tv. The cinemas are sparsely billed whenever there is a feature on the air.

The crippling entertainment tax does not help the situation and although neighboring Sweden looks like getting their tax removed, the Danish government's only concession to date is to allow cinemas to open at 2 p.m. instead of 4 p.m. on Sundays and Holy days. The only one likely to benefit from this move is the government since any additional revenue earned by the cinemas is swallowed up by the extra pay demanded by the operators and other theatre staff.

'Do Come Down' to See Us', Brazil's Invitation To Foreign Producers

Rio de Janeiro.

Newly-established Brazilian state of Guanabara, which includes the city of Rio de Janeiro, will encourage the growth of the Brazilian film industry and its own growth as the center of Brazilian industry by various aids and assistance. The major one planned will be the establishment of a film city set-up, comparable to Rome's Cine Citta, to be built on the outskirts of Rio.

Brazilian film producer and importer Louis Serrano reported here that the state's new governor, Carlos Lacerda, hopes to make Rio the hub of Brazil's industry now that the government has established Brasilia as the capital, and believes that one of the biggest steps towards this goal will be the creation of the filmmaking center—the best way to sell Rio, not only as a tourist site, but to attract new business and industries.

The film center will occupy an area which will include every type of scenic background—lakes, mountains, etc.—and a Club de Cinema administrative - research - publicity center around which will be built studios, sets, processing laboratories, houses for working stars, workshops, etc.

American aid will be sought in two ways. The facilities will be offered, on a rental basis, to American companies and/or producers for making films; or interested investors may become partners in the arrangement by investing (1) money and/or (2) technical equipment. Although this offer will also be made to European filmmakers, from an American point of view, should a producer be momentarily high on technical equipment and low on funds but wishes to shoot his picture in Brazil, he can work out an arrangement whereby his equipment will be accepted as part of his investment. Such equipment, Serrano says, would be brought into Brazil free of duty.

The government will also guarantee any American investor against any possibility of his money becoming "frozen" in the country. He would be able to take his investment out at the same rate of exchange as when he started. As a further guarantee, Brazilian banks will post a guarantee of any invested funds against loss (say, due to a change in rate of exchange) in any specified American bank during the period of investment.

Danes Dominate, Swedes Brush Luebeck 'Filmtage' Near USSR

By HANS HOEHN

Luebeck.

North German Hansa town of Luebeck, of about 235,000 population on the Baltic Sea near the Soviet-German border, dedicates itself once a year to the Scandinavian film via its so-called "Nordische Filmtage" (Northern Film Days) held in April. This little festival of four days (April 18-21)—three days in previous years—is not only to foster the traditional connections between Luebeck and the four Scandinavian countries but also give interested persons an insight into Scandinavian film-making. An interesting angle about the event is that pix which have not yet found a Teutonic distributor are displayed.

It's especially the Danes who find their way to Luebeck. The just terminated sixth Northern Film Days saw quite a number of prominent Danish film people around, including directors Bent Christensen, Knud Leif Thomsen, Jorgen Roos and Annelise Hovmand. In fact, this year's Luebeck Northern Film Days had more the character of a Danish festival. Seven of the eleven full-length films shown were of Danish origin while also most of the shorts—about four fifth—came from this country. A retrospective show dedicated itself to Jorgen Roos, Denmark's most prominent documentary film director.

Denmark, incidentally, contributed the artistically best film to the little fest: "The Duel," country's entry at last year's Berlin Film Festival. While Danish directors and producers usually specialize on comedies, "Duel" is a serious pic with no happy ending. It was Knud Leif Thomsen's first directorial effort of a feature film. Although it was, artistically speaking, a promising debut, he hasn't made a second feature since "Duel" some 14 months ago. He wrote two screenplays for Nordisk, which had him under contract, in the meantime but, obviously, the company didn't like the scripts. "We have to think in commercial terms," said O. Dorgeson, Nordisk's export director.

To the dismay of many who had come to Luebeck, no Ingmar Bergman film was screened. Northern Film Days without a Bergman film is like a cat without tail, was the general opinion. Rolf Hiller, head of the festival, said that it is not easy to get top Swedish product for Luebeck. Not only because of "unwillingness" on part of the Swedes but also because of German distribs. They don't like the idea of Swedish films which they are going to release being given preview screenings at Luebeck. The only Swedish feature shown at Luebeck was "Pearlmother" (Mother-of-Pearl), a problem film about an egocentrical mother (Inga Tidblad) who wants to keep her grownup sons for herself. Pic's director, Torgny Anderberg, came to attend the Luebeck event. He was, incidentally, the only Swede around.

In all, the guest list showed some 160 names, the greater part members of German film clubs. The Northern Film Days are arranged by the Film Club Luebeck in conjunction with the Senate of Luebeck and cultural organizations. The Film Days are part of this city's annual cultural highlights. They are said to have helped to popularize the Scandinavian film in Germany. This, of course, chiefly applies to Swedish and Danish pix. Norwegian and Finnish films are still way behind, both artistically and technically speaking.

Sweden's Second Market; Goteborg Good Show Town

By ZDENKO HIRSCHLER

Goteborg, Sweden.

Second largest city in the kingdom of Sweden, Goteborg, with 30 modern film houses in the downtown area is not to be overlooked in rental calculations. Included here is Cinerama installation where the Cinemiracle feature, "Windjammer," especially congenial to Scandinavians because of its subject matter, has lately been unreeling.

Goteborg, during World War II, was one of the "windows" looked upon the then Nazi-controlled continent. Like Lisbon, Tangiers and other spots it has since been prominent in the literature of espionage, factual and fictional.

The city, of 400,000 population, is rated a good show town. Its Stads Teater is perhaps the most modern legitimate house in Sweden. Other playhouses of live drama are the Folk and Atelje and there is an active opera company at the Stora.

Karl Gerhard occupies the circus, there is a large concert hall, a giant summer amusement park, Liseberg, and a good deal of television program production, alternating with Stockholm in supplying the Swedish tv net.

Call Arne Skouen Norway's Director With the Mostest

Oslo.

Arne Skouen is still regarded as the most serious and accomplished filmmaker of Norway. Born in 1913, he started in 1937 as a writer. A playwright, novelist and journalist he spent time in U.S.A. during the war.

Some years ago Skouen broke with the state-owned Norsk Film to form his own one-man company ABA-Film Inc. Though film production in Norway is a hazardous affair, he has turned out better films than most Norwegian film-directors. Although his script-writing often seems weak, the Skouen technique should be measured by comparative standards. Up till now "Ni Liv"-We Die Alone"—an Academy award nominee—has been regarded as his best film. This winter Skouen presented "Kalde Spor"—Cold Tracks—a film about one man and his rendezvous with conscience in stormy winter mountains of mid-Norway. A "war hero" comes back to the mother country after spending many post-war years abroad. A dozen persons had been entrusted to the guidance of this man during the Hitler occupation. He failed them and the 12 perished. It is just him, the girl and a third man who know what really happened during the storm. Now the three of them meet again at the same place under a similar wild storm. Skouen mingles the hard realism of the wild nature with the ghosts walking through the mind of this man. Skouen has created a drama of fate more than a film about one man's fight with his conscience.

The drama fails on some psychological points, but the film has nevertheless a rare grandeur. Ragnar Sorensen has lensed the magnific mountain scenes, and Gunnar Sonstevold wrote the effectful score.

"Cold Tracks" will probably represent Norway in Cannes, Berlin, or Moscow film festivals this year.

Toralv Maurstad stars in "Cold Tracks." With his Swedish-born wife, Eva Henning, he appears in Skouen's next feature, "Om Tilla"—About Tilla—scheduled for early autumn preem.

Norway in Production Slowdown Awaiting Better State Guarantee

By PAL BANG-HANSEN

Oslo.

Prospects for this year's film production in Norway looks perhaps poorer than ever before. Norwegian feature film-production may drop to half of its average of eight films a year. This results from many unfortunate circumstances. The state-owned Norsk Film is almost broke after the last two flops, "Hans Nielsen Hauge" and "An Eye on Every Finger." Neither drew the critics' acclaim and the public stayed away in the well known mobs

Biggest upcoming producer here, Karl Mons-Iversen, got a thumbs down from the committee granting state support to new film-projects, and he had to stop the work on "With Open Arms" after some few days of shooting. The government committee supported his "The Lovers" in return, and this film, based upon the novel of Terje Stigen, is scheduled to be shot this summer. Ingrid Vardund is to play the main part, producer will write the score, and Nils R. Muller will direct. Cameraman is Mattis Mathiesen who also lensed the first local pic of the year, another Mons-Iversen production.

'The Wild Duck'

Grandson of Henrik Ibsen, Norwegian film veteran Tancred Ibsen, directed his grandfather's "The Wild Duck" with great reverence, perhaps too much. Result was a dreary filmed theatre-version of the great drama. As Henki Kolstad in the part of Hjalmar Ekdal caricatured the person he was portraying, and as Kjersti Dalbye in the difficult part of Hedvig looked like an overvitaminized slalom-skiing girl of the modern welfare state, the result was not even good theatre in 35 m.

I-Film Inc. now makes its first feature film, "Freske Fraspark," or "Backiks," a product expected to be of local interest only. Bjorn Breigutu directing, Sverre Bergli photographing.

Arne Skouen's company, ARA-Film, should produce "Om Tilla," "About Tilla" for early autumn release.

Four Films

This totals four Norwegian films for the year 1963, and it is not to be expected that more will follow.

The reason for this sudden fall in the number of Norwegian feature films is certainly not to be found in the competition of the Norwegian television. Up to now about 230,000 tv sets have been sold in Norway but only about 19 hours of television programs are broadcast weekly.

Norwegian government subsidy to theatrical features has a maximum of $150,000 under the condition that the script is approved as regards quality by a state board. This system has functioned for some years, but as it favored the light-comedy producers changes are to be made. A new guarantee system is under preparation. Pending clarification producers feel some reluctance to plunge. Most of them believe that the new state guarantee system in preparation will be better than the one now existing and hence stall. This explains 1963 slowdown. Next year may be better.

RENTAL SITUATION AT OSLO, NORWAY

By PAL BANG-HANSEN

Oslo.

Studios and studio-equipment in Norway will by no means awe a Hollywood or Cinecitta conditioned producer. Norsk Film, the main part of whose shares as owned by the kingdom, was formerly the biggest feature film producer of the country. But after some boxoffice flops, its activity is restricted to newsreels and documentaries. Thus their, and the country's, only studio is available on rental.

By European standards the stage is of middle size, equipped with Mitchell and Debrie cameras. Walls have been remade to make the space suitable for direct-sound-production, but technically the result is just passable. For simple, modern settings this studio could well be used for a continental production. Actually Norsk studio is booked by independent producers well ahead, and reservations should be made at least half a year in advance. Studio is centrally located, about 15 minutes outside Oslo by tram. Rentals is about $200 a day.

Roger Arnhoff sound studio will give the best in Norwegian sound-possibilities. His studio is connected with the tiny studio of ABC-film Inc. situated in the heart of Oslo. Other small studios of Oslo are owned by Nor-film Inc. and Centralfilm Inc. Norwegian laboratories are far from good and cannot be recommended foreign producers.

Two sound stages: 110 x 60 feet, height 30 feet; 90 x 50 feet, height 27 feet.

Cinecentrum Studios

(Hilversum)

One sound stage: 60 x 40 feet, height 27 feet.

Both studios are equipped with projection rooms, sound departments, laboratories, and cutting rooms. Personnel available. Dubbing and postsynchronization possible. Special effects departments and processing laboratories. Renting of cameras (Debrie Super Parvo, Arriflex, etc.), lighting equipment. Dressing rooms and ward in building, near sound stages.

At Cinetone Studios (Duivendrechtse Kade 83-87, Amsterdam) the stages are leased for approx. $450. For days when sets are built or no shooting is done when sets are still there, the prices are $75 for Studio I, $60 for Studio II. Price includes two studios, projection room, ward rooms, make-up rooms, prop rooms, one cutting room, one camera, with rails and dolly, etc.

Normal hour rate for sound engineer: $2.00, specialized employees $1.50, laborers $0.80-$1.00.

Cinecentrum Studios ('s-Gravelandseweg 80, Hilversum) will give rates on request. Cinecentrum produces documentaries, the weekly newsreels in Holland. On the payroll are 22 directors-producers, 30 camera men, 17 sound technicians.

Tax-Groaning Denmark; Advance Funds System Of Netherlands Contrast

The Hague.

Dutch film industry, one of the smallest in Europe, has a film aid law which is peculiar to itself. A producer with a potential property has to submit his script to the Government and, if it is approved, he receives a cash advance of 100,000 guilders, equal to $28,000. If the film eventually makes a profit he is obliged to refund that advance—but that, apparently, is something of a rarity in Holland. The money is only retained when, as usually happens, the production winds up in the red.

The film aid bug is now spreading to Scandinavia which, of course, is outside Common Market territory. The new Swedish plan goes into operation within the next two months, and has been widely welcomed throughout the industry. This scheme involves the total abolition of admission duties, currently running at 25%, and instead of divvying out a quarter of their receipts to the Government, theatre owners will now have to pay 10% into a pool to assist local production. It has been estimated that this will yield a little over $1,000,000 a year and will be a valuable stimulant to production. There has been a serious falling off in film making in Sweden during the last year or two, which the 10% bonus should correct.

Tough Rap

One of the hardest hit countries in Europe is Denmark, where the admission tax runs at seven-seventeenths of boxoffice receipts, which is virtually equal to 40%. So far there is no agreed aid scheme, but talks are going on with the Government authorities, though there is some dissension within the industry as to the shape that film legislation should take. What the small Danish industry would like is something comparable to Britain's Eady plan, but they realise that is rather like asking for the moon. However, one interesting development is the fact that some Danish producers are getting together to suggest to the Government authorities that the legislation should include the formation of a films bank run on comparable lines to the British National Film Finance Corporation. So far, however, it is all in the talking stage and ther has been no serious indication that the Government is willing to be receptive to trade overtures.

It is not just the crippling tax that hurts Danish film production, but the unique law which limits ownership of picture theatres to one per company or individual. Selling a picture throughout the territory, therefore, is a slow and arduous job and the producer cannot make what is generally regarded as a circuit deal in the hope of amortising a large part of his production investment quickly. And that is one law which, under present conditions, will not be changed.

One factor that emerges clearly from this roundup of film aid customs and practices is that there is now widespread governmental recognition throughout the whole of Europe that film production is an important part of the cultural life of any nation, however small, and that producers have little chance of staying in business unless they are helped along the road. This is a significant post-war development in which Britain retains a clear lead by a healthy margin.

Finland Finicky About Sexuality Of Its Neighbor Nation, Sweden

Helsinki.

After first banning Jean-Luc Godard's "Vivre sa vie," the Finnish film censorship board decided to reverse its decision. The reversal was supported by five members of the board while three members voted for upholding the ban.

Finnish board is not compelled to declare the reasons why it bans. It is generally believed, however, that the board regarded the Frenchman's film as immoral. (Though he did not advocate banning "Vivre sa vie," Victor Vinde, executive editor of Sweden's leading socialist daily, "Stockholms-Tidningen," wrote an outspoken article claiming the film was pornography.)

Some of the other recent Finnish foreign-film bannings have included Godard's "Breathless," Ingmar Bergman's "The Virgin Spring," Joseph Losey's "The Criminal," and Jean Renoir's "Le Testament du Docteur Cordelier."

Finns also take a more puritanical view of literature than their Scandinavian neighbors. Last May, the Finnish translation of Henry Miller's "Tropic of Cancer" was confiscated by the police on orders from the Ministry of Justice one week after publication. Finland is the only Scandinavian country in which "The Song of the Red Ruby" by Norwegian author Agnar Mykle continues banned.

Most leading Finnish newspapers and literary and film critics have condemned the banning of "quality" films and books. The major complaint voiced by many is that no consideration need be given to the artistic qualities of the world. Finnish law supports the banning of any form of literature that can be regarded as immoral irrespective of its literary qualities as a whole. The same evaluation is made of films.

In reply to some of the criticism aimed at the confiscation of "Tropic of Cancer," J. O. Soderhjelm, the Finnish Minister of Justice, stated that he felt that "an average person" must feel that his "sense of decency has been outraged." Soderhjelm felt that Miller's novel did not describe love "but an erotomanic's fantasies and experiences, not with normal girls, but with the dregs among streetwalkers." The Finnish Minister of Justice concluded his statement by saying "the book may have literary qualities, but its aim is to shock, to disrupt moral views. The law clearly states that such a book should be banned."

A recently debated subject was the importance of language. A few months ago Swedish novelist Ivar-Lo Johansson, whose books have been popular throughout Scandinavia for nearly a generation, published a novel "Happiness" (Lyckan). Ivar Lo-Johansson described it as a "novel about love on earth." It told the love story of a middle aged couple who felt they could not marry or continue their relationship because the woman was unable to have a child. Much of the novel was devoted to the couple's physical love. Although the Swedish edition of the book was on sale in Finnish bookstores, publishers were unwilling to translate it. Lo-Johansson's normal Finnish publisher regarded the chances that it would be confiscated were too great. Swedish and Finnish are both officially accepted languages in Finland, but only about 8 percent of the population belongs to the Swedish-language group.

Derogatory Swedish jokes about Finns often claim that they are heavy drinkers and knife-happy, while Finns joke about immoral, over-sexed Swedes. When books have been banned in Finland, travelers through /to/ Sweden have often felt that "forbidden" literature makes excellent vacation reading or an exciting present from the big world, sinful Sweden. "Forbidden" films are worth a stimulating story.

Films of Mayhem

disposing of their mistress with knife and iron. Holland's "Alike Like Two Drops Of Water" reenacts Nazi torture systems and the Japanese "Seppuku" includes a reportedly-vivid self-disembowelment by an unemployed samurai.

Formosan "The Diabolical Queen" treats a conniving Chinese monarch poisoning and torturing those who oppose her. The British "This Sporting Life" notes the hero getting his teeth kicked out on the rugby field, having searing fights with the woman he loves and seeing her die of a cerebral hemorrhage with blood oozing from her mouth as he smashes a spider against the wall in closeup and rage.

Other Anglo entry "Lord of the Flies" portrays young boys marooned on a desert island reverting to brutal savagery and killing of each other and animals. The Rumanian "Codine" has an amiable but implacable giant of a man killing a turncoat friend with his bare hands, and the Bulgar "Tobacco" and the Russian "Optimistic Tragedy" depict bloodshed during the respective revolutions in these countries.

The Greek "Glory Sky" is about a group of soldiers getting killed off during the last war.

Apart from features showing at the festival proper the Critics separate frolic includes a couple of violent studies. "Pitfall" from Japan deals with a hired slayer at his gruesome chores. Brazil's "Porto Das Caixas" presents a wife's answer to a hated, grubby spouse: a hard blow with an axe.

Provincials Jealously Keep Control Over Kindergarten Set Attendance at Cinema

By EMIL MAASS

Vienna.

Censorship was abolished by the first Republic of Austria, founded 1918. The law is still in force. Each of the nine Austrian provinces however, (the capital Vienna is a province of its own) has its youth-admittance commission. These resemble each other in their constitution and apparatus of parent-teacher and youth organizations. Film industry itself, the distributors, and the Catholic and Protestant churches have merely advisory power.

Though these commission do not differ much in their ratings, the main problem is always "age limit." Salzburg, for instance, ruled 10-13 years, Lower Austria 14, Tyrol 16 and Vorarlberg 18 year is the "juvenile limit." Despite all endeavours by the Ministry of Education, no progress has been made in the attempt to establish a film control office on a common federal basis. The provinces stick to their regional rights and will so in future.

Sigmund Kennedy, President of the Austrian Film Journalists Society pointed out, that Germany (in population seven times that of Austria) has a uniform film control office. Austria does not even have an independent self-control organization.

Rialto-Jadran production "The Treasure of Silver Lake" after a Karl May story with the American Lex Barker as "Old Shatterhand" recently caused another stir. The Vienna admittance commission refused juvenile admittance altogether on the basis of extreme cruelty. It demanded cuts. The distrib re-submitted the picture after eliminating some scenes again to the commission, but had "overlooked" eliminating other scenes. Only after full excision was picture licensed for release. Said Vice-mayor Hans Mandl, chief of the cultural department: "There is a great difference between reading western stories by Karl May and seeing them on the screen."

B.o. in general is not bad, though 1962 showed a slight drop. Vienna it was hardly felt, 33,300,000 tickets in 1961 against 31,800,000 in 1962. As motion pictures are "getting longer" it is understandable, that the number of performances dropped.

U.S. and Africa

they decide, again individually, to go into theatre investment. At the present time pix getting regular release in the territory include U.S., French, Hindu and Arabic product—with French language soundtracks an absolute necessity.

Intent of the new MPAA focus on Africa, of course, is to develop new markets which can, eventually, offset the effects of the shrinking film markets in other parts of the world. Nobody thinks that it isn't going to be a long, long range project. But MPAA member company execs point to the results of their Export Co. in British West Africa, as indicative of what can be done with a little preplanning.

Export, headed by Jack Lebow and assistant William Saunders, was a long time getting underway but, according to one interested party, no individual U.S. film company would have had the time or the facilities to do what is now being accomplished by the collective effort. By assuring a constant supply of films AMPECA has sponsored what is in effect a theatre construction boom in Nigeria alone. Prior to AMPECA's existence, Nigeria (pop., 40,000,000) had 74 theatres, all but four of which were open air affairs that often served as parking lots during the day. By the end of this year, a minimum of a dozen new, enclosed theatres will have opened.

Export setup is "revolutionizing" film distribution in the former British colonies by (1) introducing the "consecutive, extended run" (formerly an individual picture might play Tuesday one week, be brought back Thursday the following week, and so on); (2) introducing modern ad-pub procedures; (3) introducing percentage terms which, at least according to U.S. distribs, prompt more individual attention to their programs on the part of exhibs. As MPAA tells it too, the success of AMPECA is pleasing the local governments, which see it as helping develop the countries via increased employment, as well as increased prestige.

That it has been a costly undertaking to the member companies is not denied, but they argue that because of its very cost, no individual company could have done it alone. (For example, because of the housing and office shortage in Lagos—a situation said to be caused largely by the free-spending tactics of the various U.S. government missions and the Chase Manhattan Bank, AMPECA had to shell out three years' rent in advance, not only to get office space, but to secure living quarters for its personnel.)

At the moment, AMPECA has about 150 films either in release or going into release. Member companies contribute to the overhead in proportion to the earnings of their individual films, receiving, in turn, profits in the same proportion.

Expense Acct. Blues

in contrast, had halfull restaurants and hotels.

He said the tourist business was at a normal rate and the newspaper strike had no noticeable effect on the restaurant business.

But visiting businessmen fly in and fly out spending nary a dime on the good and formerly deductible life, Sardi continued.

Accountants of big corporations are worried, Sardi went on, and vent their woes by red pencilling personal expense budgets.

Don Hickey, general manager of the Hotel Commodore, said the hotel industry is "on the precipice of bankruptcy." Visitors are spending less time in the city and not making the nitery rounds, he continued.

Unemployment

David Siegal, prexy of the New York local exec board of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees & Bartenders International Union, reviewed the spectre of unemployment. Old and experienced hands are being laid off and new ones are turned away at the door.

The new unemployed workers, in turn, will stop buying in medium priced spots.

This reverse economic multiplier was also described by Louis Broido of the N.Y. Dept. of Commerce. The new regulations, Broido said, just by cutting into restaurant and hotel receipts will eventually cut into every segment of the economy creating a total $7,000,000,000 slump.

William Aydelotte, a spokesman for the Marketing Executives Int'l, stated that salesmen need so much time to keep entertainment records, "they lacked the necessary time to sell."

branch, has more than 35 pix credits, is one of the founders and prexy of the Motion Picture Industry Council; is acting chairman of Hollywood Guilds Festival Committee; American Bar Assn.'s liaison rep to the legal advisory committee for pix and tv; director of the National Film Project of the American Jewish Community relations agencies; was p.r.-entertainment director for the Demo national conclave in L.A. in 1960. Rivkin is currently at the Cannes Film Festival as chairman of the official U.S. delegation, so the award presented by Mary C. McCall Jr. was accepted for him by Herbert Baker.

'Gridiron'-Type Show

Following presentation of the awards, the writers put on their traditional "gridiron"-type show, in which they had a lot of fun at the expense of industry targets. Show produced and directed by Danny Arnold had an array of talent— Ed Begley, the Jud Conlon Singers, Tony Curtis, Stanley Adams, Julie Bennett, Polly Bergen, Imogene Coca, Ray Danton, Nick Adams, Sandra Gould, Marilyn Erskine, Jose Ferrer, Zsa Zsa Gabor, Paul Lynde, Ricardo Montalban, Jack Kruschen, Rose Marie, John McGiver, Richard Ney, Alan Reed, Karen Parker, Paula Prentiss, Myrna Ross, Arnold Stang, Valerie Varda, Bill Stout, Ray Walston, Jack Weston and the Guild's song-and-dance trio, Arnold, Herbert Baker and Albert Lewis.

Roasted and ribbed were such diverse subjects as runaway production, "Lawrence of Arabia," pay tv, the Production Code, Liz and Dick, the Internal Revenooers, the new wave, "The Chapman Report," and of course, that "persecuted minority"—the screenwriter.

Again the mythical "Samuel Bronston Award" was presented, this time presenter Johnny Green handing the award "to the individual who has contributed the most to stimulate Hollywood film production" to an emissary of the "winner" — Egypt's President Nasser.

Jose Ferrer, in the role of the Nasser emissary, accepted the award, for "Lawrence of Arabia," but remarked that the pic seen here is just the trailer, that they're still shooting over there. Everybody in his country was in the pic, "it looked like Saturday night at P. J.'s," cracked Ferrer. He ended with a message from Nasser: "Come to our happy country on the banks of the Nile . . . all of you. But buy a one-way ticket. Your people have always walked home. Shalom."

Pay tv pays everybody but the writer, per a tollvee sketch taking place in the future. The President of that future era is a Kennedy—Bobby, that is. Taking part in the skit were Ed Begley, Stanley Adams, Arnold Stang and Julie Bennett.

Relaxation of the Production Code was given a thorough going-over in a sketch taking place in 1973, with subjects now taboo all included in a picture to be made by Walt Disney—"Great Grandson of Flubber." Jack Weston, Ray Danton and Miss Bennett participated.

Sexy Musicals

Marge Champion, Rose Marie and Imogene Coca thrushed a number in which they portrayed Jeanette MacDonald, Ginger Rogers and Ruby Keeler urging "bring back the musicals," showing how they would update them by injecting sex, sex and sex into the lyrics.

Polly Bergen and the Jud Conlon Singers reprised what has become a Guild dinner classic, the song titles routine, with such earthy numbers as "Sodom and Gomorrah," "The Chapman Report Marching Song" and "Freud."

Taking due recognition of the most publicized pair of the year, the writers had an amusing blackout anent Elizabeth Taylor and Richard Burton, with Julie Bennett and Frank Gardner cast in the roles.

Glee of the income tax man in happily hounding Hollywoodians was the subject of "The Infernal Revenue" sketch, with Paul Lynde, Nick Adams, Jack Kruschen, Arnold Stang and Myrna Ross participating. Says the tax man at one point: "We give the taxpayer the benefit of every doubt—then crucify him." Film people are described as "childish, disorganized, not solid businessmen who keep legitimate records, like, say GE, or the Mafia."

Writer, played by Stang, explains why he's now driving a hearse: "It's easier than doing plots for 'Wagon Train.' At Revue they make you do four or five drafts. At Pierce Bros. you do it once and it's a final." "Where's the freedom Benedict Arnold died for?" asks the agent (Kruschen) indignantly when quizzed by the taxman. Asides the tax man: "They're like little children . . . like Leopold and Loeb."

A takeoff on the new wave has the annual award for the most nouvelle, most vague film of the year going to "Gidget Goes to Chaos" writer-director Alain Bobbe-Zugsmith; it edged out such candidates as "Tammy and the Pervert," "Nine Hours to Intermission" and "Bar-Mitzvah: Italian Style." Award is made by Brigitte Banal, who has won previous "awards" for most vacant stare by an idle prostitute, most aimless walk by a nervous woman, and most erotic kiss by a blood relative. Valerie Varda played the presenter, Ricardo Montalban the "new wave" winner, Richard Ney the m.c.

Sketches and musical numbers were penned by Arnold Baker, Irving Brecher, Richard Breen, Richard DeRoy, I.A.L. Diamond, Hal Borne, Julius Epstein, Ray Evans, Sammy Fain, Austin (Rocky) Kalish, Hal Kanter, Mort Lachman, Ernest Lehman, Jay Livingston, Nat Perrin, Ben Roberts, Harry Tugend, Melville Shavelson, Paul Francis Webster and Billy Wilder.

Aiding Arnold on the show were production manager James Tugend, production designer Seymour Klate, choreographer Jack Baker, costume designer Ruth Weiss, musical director Matty Melnick and production assistant William Hellinger. Rivkin was general chairman of the event, helped by vice chairman Richard Collins, Isabel Dawn and Albert Aley. Lucille Vaughn and Jill Parsons were the coordinators.

Videoless Israel Big Film Importer; Helps Foreign Film Producers There

By JOSEPH LAPID

Tel Aviv.

Israel was the site of 10 feature film productions in 1962. No more than that number is probable for 1963. Nor has the Jewish state been successful as yet in creating the big studios, often mentioned as sure but somehow never materializing. American showmen gravitate to Britain, Italy, Spain, Germany, France where subsidies and co-production values are significant. With a mere 2,300,000 population Israel's own playoff is not substantial enough.

Government is trying to help through its Office for the Advancement of the Israeli Film Industry, headed by Asher Hirschberg. The Office grants loans (and tax-exemptions) to local producers or foreigners, who make co-productions with Israeli talent in Israel.

Seven months of uninterrupted sunshine, topographic richness—from deserts to mountains—cramped into a small country, good roads, modern hotels, "Western" conditions and English-speaking actors and technicians are the added values Israel can offer to foreign producers. However, for some reason or another, only a few are attracted. Last big foreign pic made in Israel was the "Two Enemies" with David Niven, two years ago.

There are two small, but well equipped studios in Israel, both in the vicinity of Tel Aviv. One is Israel Motion Picture Studios Ltd. in Herzlyia, headed by Mrs. Margot Klausner. The other one is Geva Films, Ltd. in Givatayim, headed by Mordechai Navon. Both are renting soundstages, technical crew and laboratories (black and white). A work day is 8 hours and a full weeks rent is charged as five days only.

Israel Motion Picture is offering a 14x8x7 meter sound-stage for $50 daily rent. (A big sound-stage, 30x25x12 is under construction, to be completed by the end of the year). An Arriflex camera, Model 2B is rented for $41 d., a Mitchell N.C. for $53 and a Newall, series 2, with Cooke lenses (18-100) for $40 daily. "Geva" is renting a fully airconditioned sound-stage, 10x16x8 for $70 daily and a construction stage for an additional 30 dollars. A new Mitchell B.N.C. is rented for $60 per day.

Foreign production unit should bring along, beside the director, a chief cameraman and a chief sound engineer, too. On the other hand, he will have a fair choice of assistants for $20-30 daily.

Supporting actors, usually from Tel Aviv legit theatres, on a relatively high standard, get only $20-30 daily, with the exception of a few, who get a little more. All of them speak English and can play in English, but not in the role of an Englishman or even an American.

There is complete freedom of action and the authorities are usually helpful when asked to assist (in blocking a street, for instance). But lately they became more cautious, since an Italian producer, who was permitted to film in a girl's Army Camp, shot a couple of naked girl-soldiers sun-bathing.

Where a producer is asking for Government subsidy, he has to submit to a certain amount of censorship. This consists of submitting the script to a committee, which has to approve it in order to make subsidy available. However this control is rather lax and approves of practically everything, with the exception of immoral, anti-religious or anti-Israeli pictures. (They will also refuse to help German producers).

As for local productions: the following pics are scheduled for release in 1963, with some possible degressions or additions:

1) "Af Milla Le'Morgenstein" (Not a Word to Morgenstein), released last March. A musical comedy. Produced by Joseph Zukeida in Israel Motion Picture Studio, Herzlyia. Directors: Benjamin Karetsky, Ben Oserman, Arie Elias. Script based on play by Ephraim Kishon. Writers: Gavriel Dagan, Erika Oserman, Benjamin Karetsky, Arie Elias. Camera: Benjamin Karetsky. Music: Moshe Wilensky. Stars Avraham Ben-Yosef, Gila Almagor, Joseph Banay, Yakov Bodo. Running time 77 minutes.

2) "Hamartef" (The Cellar), under release. A one-man pic, the life story of a young German Jew, who finds his life in ruins after World War 2. A Shay Film production. Producers: Shimon Yisraeli and Nachum Slonim. Made at the Israel Motion Picture Studio, Herzlyia. Director: Nathan Gross. Camera: Yasha Yanilovitch. Script: Shimon Yisraeli and Nathan Gross. Music: Shimon Yisraeli, adapted by Eddie Halpern. Staring Shimon Yisraeli in five roles. Running time: 65 minutes.

3) "Rak Belira (One Pound Only), release date: May. Slapstick comedy, about a couple of peddlers, who try to obtain a steady job and a nice apartment. Produced by K. Gredinger and Yoram Gross. Made in Israel Motion Picture Studio, Herzliya. Director: Yoram Gross. Script: Moshe Hader. Music: Eddie Halpern. Camera: Nissim Leon. Editor: Dany Schrick. Stars: Gideon Singer and Yakov Ben-Sira. Running time 80 minutes.

4) Eldorado, release date: September. A drama of the Israeli underworld. A Geva and Noah Film production. Producer: Mordechay Navon. Made in Geva Films studio, Givatayim. Director: Menachem Golan. Adapted by Leo Filler from play by Ygael Mossinson. Script: Menachem Golan and Amatsia Hiouni. Music: Yohanan Zarai. Design: Shlomo Zafrir. Camera: Nissim Leon. Editor: Nelly Bogor. Starring Gila Almagor, Haim Topol, Yosef Yadin, Shay K. Ophir, Shimeon Finkel. Under production.

5) "Eshet Hagibor" (Hero's Wife), release date this fall. A triangle drama in a kibbutz, overshadowed by the missing hero. A Lancetti-Frye Films production. Director: Peter Frye. Script by Peter Frye, Batya Lancetti and Yoram Matmor, based on story by Margot Klausner. Camera: Marko Yakovlevitch. Shot at kibbutzim, made by Israel Motion Picture Studio, Herzlyia. Starring: Batya Lancetti, Gideon Shemer, Shmuel Omani. Under production.

6) "Panim Hadashot Bemara" (New Face in the Mirror), release date: end of the year. A Geva Films production. Producer: Mordechay Navon. Director: Ivan Lengyel. Based on book by Yael Dayan. Script: Jacques Remy, assisted by Edna Shavit. Starring: Dina Doron. Shooting starts in June. English and Hebrew version.

There are a couple of more pictures in various stages of production, but still uncertain, whether they will be released this year. Among them: "Bab el Uad" (the name of a valley near Jerusalem, where fierce fighting between Jews and Arabs went on through 1948). This, in fact, will be a re-make of "A stone on every mile", an Israeli pic, which was not released because of bad previews. Austrian director Wolfgang Gluck is in charge of the new venture (he had nothing to do with the old one) and he brought in for heroine's role, young actress Clarisse Stolz, daughter of famed Austrian composer and conductor Robert Stolz. Other pic under production, but not yet scheduled for release is a comedy, "The Blaumilch Canal" based on story by humorist Ephraim Kishon.

This output satisfies only a slight part of the demand and the Israeli audience will depend for many a year coming mostly on imported films. (Television is non-existent in Israel). People here buy nearly 50 million theatre tickets a year). More than 300 pictures are imported yearly. There is a slight regression in the number of U.S. pics imported, since they make up less than half of the total import, while in years past they had more than 50% of the market. But, according to Simha Grunewald, General Manager of Fox and President of American Motion Picture Assn. in Israel, American products hold about 60% of viewing hours. This is due to introduction of big productions like Exodus and West Side Story, which have not only a longer running time, but a bigger audience too.

Except for the cheapest tickets, general and municipal taxes amount to 30% of each ticket's cost. Distributors of American pics receive 35% on the income after taxes. However, they get as much as 70% for the big ones, like West Side Story. The Theatre Owners' Association is trying hard to fight back this trend, but so far with no avail. "Film distribution in Israel is based on solid business principles"—according to Mr. Grunewald.

Government Censorship Committee only rarely interferes with distribution of films. Though "immoral" pics are banned, the approach is rather liberal by American standards. French pics, which would be certainly banned in the majority of states, are shown "for adults only". Sometimes a couple of vulgar scenes are to be cut out. Horror scenes are also permitted, provided they are part of a generally acceptable product. But horror for horror's sake is taboo. The main difference between Israeli standards and those accepted by censors in other parts of the free world is a general ban against German productions and a very cautious approach to any pic that presents Germans in a sympathetic way. Two American pictures, "The Desert Fox", about the life of Germany's Marshall Rommel and "Escape from East-Berlin," a recent production about tunnelling the Wall, were banned.

There also exists a blacklist of producers, directors and actors who collaborated with the Nazis.

Spaniards Having Better Results In South America

Madrid.

Spanish film industry's ambitious distribution design for its product in at least the Spanish-language markets has produced results beyond expectation during the past year. The best indication of striking progress were the efforts made by both Italian and Mexican film industry leaders to link their own distribution facilities with Cinespana for joint operations in Latin America. The Mexican bid was particularly significant. Mexico already has a well entrenched Peli-Mex distribution setup in all territories where Cinespana now prepares to dig in. It is not unlikely that even American independents might come into the fold should the Spanish organization decide later to handle non-Spanish product as well.

Some 22 top Spanish producers banded together in Cinespana. They have watched the organization develop a solid footing in Chile. Here, Cinespana has set up the Sociedad Hispano Film—partnership venture with Chilean distribs that guarantees release of Spanish product throughout the country. Simultaneously, a new cinema of the same name, Cinespana, started operations early this year for the exploitation of Spanish pix only. Initial results spell out a rousing success. Opening entry, "Fray Escoba" (Friar with a Broom) stayed on for 10 smash weeks. From all indications this salle will need only six to eight Spanish pix per year for capacity or near capacity operations.

In line with Cinespana's preference for regional arrangements in the Spanish lingual markets, the distrib network has spread to Argentina, Uruguay and Paraguay where another joint venture setup, "Film Espana" is already officially constituted. Arrangement in this territory will bring Cinespana into close collaboration with a major circuit in Buenos Aires. This circuit will spark marketing of Spanish pix throughout Argentina and in the two neighboring countries.

Agreements are also expected in Venezuela, where Cinespana will have a choice of one of the two top distributors for partnering under a new company, still unnamed. Organizational move in the Dominican Republic and Puerto Rico are in the wind.

Cinespana started operations with a 10,000,000 peseta ($160,000) investment and this amount will be increased during the current year. The organization is headed by David Jato with a temporary board comprising Jorge Tusell, Cesareo Gonzalez, Benito Perojo, Manuel Goyanes and Jose Luis Navascues. Tusell is president of Unicspana (Spanish Producers' Assn.); Jato is its secretary general. All the other board members also play prominent roles in the producers setup. Cinespana, however, is completely divorced from Unicspana as a private endeavor free of government or Entertainment Sindicate ties for the purpose of exploiting Spain-made pix in those areas of the world film market where local linguals stand the best chance of boxoffice acceptance.

Theatres Go Up, Grosses Down

[IN GREECE]

By RENA VELISSARIOU

Athens.

Films remain the main entertainment of the Greek public. There is no television as yet and the admission prices are considerably lower than any other kind of local entertainment. Due to the tremendous increase of population in Athens and Piraeus area, these two key cities of this country are almost united with their suburbs and cover the one fifth of the population of the whole territory.

Business is up totally this year. There is an increase of 2,300,000 admissions against the corresponding figure of the same period last year. Yet both distributors and exhibitors are facing a crisis because the average grosses have dropped considerably. Even so there are still outsiders willing to speculate in the erection of further film houses.

Theatre Construction

More than 1,000 screen theatres are operating in Greece including the open air ones. Construction continues. First runs in Athens have trippled in the last decade. Within the year 36 new winter theatres have been constructed and opened in Athens and Piraeus area and five in Salonica the third key city of Greece. Of these seven are first runs in Athens, namely the Academia, Argentina, Embassy, Omonoia, Cine Opera, Gloa and Petit Palais of a total capacity more than six thousand seats.

The following figures covering seven months of each season show ticket sales at Athens 42 first runs:

Mar Del Plata: It's Collapsible

(Resort Calls Fest Amateur-Run)

Mar Del Plata.

A falling out this year between the festival authorities and the officials of the city of Mar Del Plata is credited with having contributed to much of the confusion that surrounded the just concluded fifth international Mar Del Plata film festival. This falling out reportedly occurred when the fest people, who were late in paying last year's bills, insisted on making all their own arrangements for hotel rooms, transportation, special functions, thus bypassing the highly promotion-minded city council and local tourism bureau.

According to city councilman Norberto Paoletti, the fest people "are a bunch of amateurs" when it comes to organizing the physical and technical details involved in handling the 300-odd specially invited fest guests. In years past, these details were handled by the city, with the fest taking care of the artistic side. He says that Mar Del Plata, which is to Buenos Aires what Atlantic City is to New York, handles a continuous series of conventions and meetings and its officials know their business.

Mar Del Plata, the sixth largest city in Argentina, has a winter population of 250,000 which, in the height of the now-ending summer season, swells to 1,500,000. (Says Paoletti: "In the winter it is quiet and clean, and much too big for us.") Because Argentina's 2,500 miles of Atlantic coastline has only a handful of natural harbors (and those formed by at the mouths of rivers), there are no cities of a size comparable to Mar Del Plata between the mouth of the River Plate in the north to the battered reaches of Tierra Del Fuego to the south. Thus one witnesses the odd sight of literally hundreds of thousands of persons cramming Mar Del Plata's comparatively few beaches, even though there are plenty of other lovely and near empty beaches no more than a 10-minute drive out of town.

As the fall season begins, most of Mar Del Plata's 1,400 hotels are still crowded, but not with the posh crowd (they go to Punta Del Este in Uruguay or Guaruya in Brazil). Rather this city is the haven for Argentina's huge middle class—the only one of substantial size in all of South America. There is little evidence here of the political and economic woes which are racking the country. The casinos are jammed, through most of the honky tonk nightclubs are empty except on weekends. Prices are generally low, but a shot of imported scotch costs about $1.25, compared to about 50c for a not exactly rare domestic brand.

What with all the street vendors, balloon salesmen, knickknack shops, etc., fest visitors seldom saw much of the "real" Mar Del Plata, which is a bustling, prosperous metropolis and highly civic minded (Mar Del Plata has the only privately endowed hospital for crippled children in all of Argentina). Unfortunately, too, most fest guests are in and out so fast they have no chance to venture away from the city to see the beauty of the rolling pampas, one of the world's richest grazing lands and generally treeless except for occasional clumps of eucalyptus. It's the land of the gaucho and of estancias (estates) so huge they could only fit in Texas. Gone are all traces of the city's beginnings, early in the last century, as an outpost for cattle raisers and fur traders. This land too had its troubles with its native Indians, who were civilized (massacred) out of existence. Indeed, if all the billboards were not in Spanish, one might have trouble believing he was not in some sort of slightly mad New Jersey—paced to the Spanish.

PRODUCTION COSTS IN ARGENTINA

Stages: Sizes & Rentals

Buenos Aires.

The studios recently most in use here are leased from either (1) Argentina Sono Film, (2) Lumiton or (3) Baires. Rentals run around $560 to $1,000 weekly, U.S. dollar value. Hire of a shooting crew figures to another $1,300 weekly. Construction crews average around $1,000 weekly, depending how elaborate sets are.

Sono Film has five stages, or galleries as they are called here: 4-30 x 40 x 15 metres; 1-20 x 30 x 12 with sound recording facilities; 25 individual dressing rooms and two communal dressing rooms for extras.

Baires has two galleries of 30 x 40 x 14 metres; 20 individual dressing-rooms and two communal.

Lumiton has one gallery 44 x 22, one of 21 x 40 and another of 40 x 16; one of 40 x 25, plus 20 individual dressing rooms.

Actors Cut: What They Can

There are no fixed talent rates, fees depending on boxoffice standing (and often on the Actor's personal need for coin). A star may collect $2,000 to $5,000 per picture, or say 240,000 to 600,000 Argentine pesos.

The Screen Union has recently protested the increasing propensity to delay paying actors, demanding that if INC pays out production loans, the Union should be notified, so payment of players' fees may be demanded as soon as the coin's in the kitty. This helps explain INC's desire to leaven out "undesirable" producers.

Dutch Film Industry in Low-Gear With Five Pix; Three Artistic Flops

By HANS SAALTINK

Amsterdam.

Three Dutch feature films were released in 1962, two at the beginning of 1963 — five films, of which three were artistic flops.

Kees Brusse's "Funfair in the Rain" (Kermis In De Regen) lacked a good coherent script and suffered from an inadequate soundtrack. "Riffi in Amsterdam" was the Dutch debut of John Korporaal who in Mexico made a satirical film "El Brass Fuerte." "Riffi in Amsterdam" (Nederlandse Productie Maatschappij) suffered from an uneven script (also written by Korporaal) and bad acting, and an explanation for the concessions made in this film is that the director was desperate to please his producer, who after all gave him a chance to return home. Korporaal is going to make another film for the N.F.M. starting May 15, but particulars of the production are kept under cloak. "Funfair in the Rain" did not do very well on the home market, but was sold to English television after being shown at the Edinburgh film festival. "Riffi in Amsterdam" about broke even.

The third 1962 release was the Rudy Meyer production "Resistance" (De Overval), directed by Paul Rotha, who took over the directional stint when Bert Haanstra decided he wanted to make a feature length documentary on the face and behavior of the Dutchman unobserved but for the hidden camera, "Jan En Alleman" (John and Everybody). "Resistance," about a raid of members of a resistance group in 1944, to free some 30 political prisoners, was a success and in Holland some million cinemagoers went to see the film within 10 weeks. In Amsterdam the film was shown for five weeks in the Tuschinski (700 seats), then moved for another 11 weeks to the smaller Rony Theatre, where again night after night it was sold out.

Initial film of Pan Film, a group of young filmers, proved a dud. "Fietsen Naar De Maan" (Bicycling to the Moon), directed by Jef van der Heyde, was not very brilliant and lacked technical knowhow. Because of inexperience in production the film cost too much, and when the film was taken off the program after one bad week, nothing could be done but write it off. For the moment Pan Film is licking its wounds and has no plans for the immediate future.

After making two films with the Nederlandse Productie Maatschappij Fons Rademakers decided he wanted complete freedom, and sought and found a backer in Alfred Heineken who set up Cineurope. Rademakers adapted a W. F. Hermans novel, "Dark Room of Damocles" which is published in England (by William Heinemann Ltd.) and the U.S. (Grove Press). Many liberties were taken with the original so that the film version was retitled "As Two Drops of Water." The film was made on a $600,000 budget (average for a Dutch film is $160,000), with Frenchman Raoul Coutard as cameraman. The film was both an artistic and a financial success, doing very well in its five weeks run at two Amsterdam cinemas, one an art house, the other a more popular cinema. Paul Kijzer who by way of his Malfbo-distributing company distributed the film in Holland, backed the film with an extensive publicity campaign of $30,000. Kijzer also handles the world rights of "As Two Drops of Water," which is the Dutch entry at the Cannes film festival.

A new production outfit is Caesar Film, set up by Paul Kijzer, who started with a Dutch-French co-production, "The Nicest Frauds in the World," a film consisting of five sketches set in Paris, Milan, Tokyo, Marrakech and Amsterdam, the latter directed by Roman Polanski, about a little girl that is mad about diamonds. Paul Kijzer also bought the rights to Alden Hatch's biography of Prince Bernard, and will give the script to a foreign filmmaker to realize. Another film about a member of the Dutch Royal Family is now made by Gerard Rutten, who during the war was personal secretary to the late Queen Wilhelmina, subject of the documentary "Mother of the Fatherland." For Austrian producer Otto Duerer, Rutten will direct "Ragita," with Curd Jurgens and Elsa Martinelli.

Victoria Film is straightening out legal side of a coproduction with Soviet Russia, on a war-time episode, set in 1945, when Georgians on the Island of Texel rebelled against the Germans. After selling out his rights on the Rotterdam Cinerama Theatre, Herman Ilmer is trying to get concessions for drive-in theatres, commercial pay-television, and setting up a production entitled "Five Crosses to Eternity." Script for "Five Crosses to Eternity" has been finished twice, but everytime was destroyed and rewritten. Eva Bartok, Trevor Howard and O. E. Hasse, together with Dutch actors Guus Hermus and Hans Kaart, have consented to play in this venture, which will be filmed in Brazil, but no decision has been reached regarding a director. Herman Ilmer wants documentary filmer Herman van der Horst to direct it, because at least in his shorts Van der Horst has tackled the subject of rugged nature that will be the background of "Five Crosses to Eternity." Herman van der Horst, however, has not consented yet, as he is finishing a short film on the city of Amsterdam, which should be ready on June 1. At that time he will tell whether or not he will accept helming "Five Crosses to Eternity."

In 1956 the Film Production Fund was set up by the Dutch Cinema League and the government, to finance partly three or four Dutch feature films. Annually a total of $150,000 can be spread over feature film productions. The aid must be returned from the profits, but in the past only one film, Bert Haanstra's "Fanfare," was such a success that it showed any profit. Now, Rademakers' "As Two Drops of Water" and Rotha's "Resistance" probably will make enough money to return the guarantee from the Production Fund. Without the Film Production Fund few producers would gamble on native films, but with a subsidy of about one quarter of the costs, they can break even, because, however bad a Dutch feature film turns out to be, there's always a public that wants to hear Dutch spoken in a film and watch Dutch actors, popular from radio and television. In the past few Dutch feature film have been sold to foreign countries, and outside rental fees have been a negligible minimum. Brusse's "Funfair in the Rain," a thriller, was shown on English BBC television.

The Ministry of Arts subsidizes documentaries with $115,000 annually, upped for 1963 to $130,000. In 1962 some 50 documentaries were made, among them "Pan" by Herman van der Horst, which at the Cannes film festival 1962 received a special prize from the jury. At the Berlin film festival two Dutch shorts were entried, and Jan Vrijman won the Golden Bear with his "The Reality of Karel Appel," over Bert Haanstra's "Zoo," a film shot with the hidden camera, that won the critic's prize. Haanstra's "Delta Phase I" was awarded at the festivals of Venice, Warsaw, and Cork. Most of the entries to foreign festivals went under the banner of the Ministries of Arts and Foreign Affairs. 78 films were sent to 33 festivals, copping 32 prizes and awards. The Dutch film acquired some success at the Edinburgh film festival where a special Holland Day was organized, with the showing of seven documentaries, among them "Pan," Charles Huguenot van der Linden's "Big City Blues," "Karel Appel," and "Zoo." Jan Hulsker's "Erasmus" received the prize of the Council of Europe at the festival of Cork. Charles Huguenot van der Linden regarded his short "Big City Blues" as an exercise for a feature film he wanted to make during the summer of 1962. He prepared a script, titled "The Wild Years," but it was considered too bold and direct, and a subsidy from the Dutch Film Production Fund was refused unless he wanted to make certain changes and cuts. Van der Linden tried to find Belgian, German and English backing but failed. In 1962 Charles Huguenot van der Linden made a semi-documentary, "Dutch in Seven Lessons" (Rank), which proved to be the launching of Audrey Hepburn. Since then he concentrated on making documentaries, most well-known of which were "The Morning Star," "Interlude By Candle Light" and "Big City Blues."

'Always A Crisis' Motto on Shield Of Harassed Argentine Film Trade

By NED EMBER

Buenos Aires.

There is new—or the same old—talk of "crisis" in Argentine production. To which it might be appended the obvious fact that crisis prevails in nearly every branch of Argentine industry today.

It seems inexplicable that people are found still willing to risk money on film ventures. Either it's a love of adventure, or an excuse to stay up late. (Most shooting is done by night, to avoid the worst of the power cuts.)

One crisis was sparked when Marcela Simonetti postponed shooting on "Unos Cuantos Dias" (Some Few Days), which Leopoldo Torre Nilsson is to direct, with Graciela Borges and Arture Garcia Buhr in leading roles. Suspension was attributed to uncertainty on the outcome of Exhibitor-Producer negotiations, which had dragged endlessly for 18 months. However, an agreement is now in sight, so producers will know what to expect in future.

A previous agreement, reached on August 3, 1962, was held up by INC chief Gati Aguilar, who disagreed as to disposal of a "promotion fund," and because exhibitors who punctually pay into the Tax Dept. their proportion of the 10% admission tax, were at odds with exhibitors who are in arrears. Under the final formula, exhibitors and producers are to share in the proceeds of the admission tax when native product is exhibited, each side getting 10½%. Exhibitors wanted this arrangement made retroactive to November 1961. This was accepted after some palaver, but is differing conditions for exhibitors who are up to date in tax payments, and those who are not. The latter are to assign payments to cover cash awards to local production.

Under the new arrangement, producers get 1½% less in subsidies than they did formerly. The arrangement has been based on the tax proceeds running from 206 to 210 million pesos annually. As from March 1, 1963, producers will negotiate releases directly with exhibitors and the obligatory exhibition clause for the native product is eliminated from the Film Law passed in 1957.

Agreement also covered the 44 or so pictures currently awaiting release: all pictures classified as obligatory prior to August 3, 1961, must be exhibited under the former conditions. Those so classified subsequent to August 3, 1961, and released prior to Dec. 31, will continue under the previous system of exploitation. Those classified for obligatory exhibition subsequent to August 3 and as yet unreleased, to be exploited under the free enterprise system. The new system to come into force at latest by Sept. 30, 1963.

The INC authorities insisted on maintaining their right to impose penalties in specific cases and made some legal objections, but in general the agreement is satisfactory all round, though formalities of approval by INC and promulgation by Executive Power decree are lacking.

If the 10% tax revenue exceeds 260 million pesos, awards are to be made to outstanding product, but 30% of any such surplus must swell a fund to promote foreign markets. Anything over to swell the producers' recuperation fund.

This system will remove the injustice whereby producers were subsidized at the cost of exhibitors, and have the further incentive to make good pictures, for which exhibitors may compete on an open market.

New Spurt

In general producers went all out to get pictures completed in time to exhibit to visitors at the Mar del Plata Festival on March 13. Some laboratories had to work night and day to cope with the rush.

The extent of local production's present ambitions was shown by the INC choice of Rodolfo Kuhn's "Los Jovenes Viejos" ('The Young Oldsters') to compete for the best foreign film Oscar of the Hollywood Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences.

INC's recent tightening up on production loans has been designed to eliminate "fly-by-night" producers. At the start of the year the Foreign Office inked a new deal with French Ambassador Jean Paul Boncour, calling for reciprocal interchange of 35 pictures a year, increased coproduction with maximum and minimum capital contributions of 70% and 30%, plus free exploitation for films of under 1000 metres, or of cultural interest. The agreement will be retroactive to April 1962, replacing the one signed April 25, 1958.

Foreign Films Shoot In Greece

By RENA VELISSARIOU

Athens.

Greece has become one of the most active countries as far as the production field is concerned though local films are not getting any more the playing time and terms as in the past. The number of Greek films produced the year just ended is around 30 as it was the previous one.

Greek films are mostly for local consumption but there is a development in quality year by year. Michael Kakoyannis is still one of the best Greek directors and his latest film, "Helectra," with Irene Papas in the title role has won many distinctions abroad.

Studio that has always a hit every year is the Finos Film. This year's success is the "Law No. 4000" which broke all records. Its story is based on the law by which juvenile delinquency and the "beatniks" are being persecuted. It is directed by Yannis Dalianides with Zoe Laskari in the leading role.

Finos Film has under exclusive contract Aliki Vouyouklaki, called the Brigitte Bardot of Greece. Aliki Vouyouklaki is the leading lady in the Greek American coproduction "Aliki" of the Finos Film with producer-director Rudolph Mate and producer-writer Georges Saint Georges. Jess Conrand as well as other local actors have roles in this picture which was shot in Athens and on location in the island of Ios.

Another local hit so far was the "Stairsteps of Life" which had very good results.

Greek producers have organized a "Week of Greek Films" during the Salonica Fair some years ago, in order to give a push to their films and a chance to be internationally noticed during this fair. This turned into a festival two years ago with participation of foreign films invited from the countries which had their pavilions in this fair. Last year's Festival had a great success and plans are made to be organized better and moved to Athens.

Foreign producers are attracted to this locale for shooting pictures. The government facilities, the cheap layout and an uninterrupted schedule of work by fine weather are the main factors to persuade everyone to come here.

Latest to utilize Greek backgrounds was Elia Kazan who shot most of his new film "America America" in Greece. This picture for Athena Enterprises Inc. was from Kazan's own screenplay and for Warner Bros. release. Kazan is telling the story of a young Greek who leaves his house in Asia Minor, to go to America, the land of opportunity, in order to escape the Turkish oppression. It is the symbol of every immigrant who tried to reach the Promised Land. Here is Stathis Giallelis. Others include Frank Wolff, Solem Ludwig, Paul Mann, John Marley, Joanna Frank, Cathering Balfour and Gergory Rozakis. They are unknowns in the U.S. film world, and many are making their film debuts with this picture.

Producer-director Rudolph Mate and producer-writer Georges Saint Georges are planning to shoot another picture here early this spring. It will be based on the ancient Greek classic comedy 'The Lysistrata" by Aristophanes and will be lensed in color and Cinemascope with Aliki Vouyouklaki in the title role, and Alexis Solomos as Aristophanes. Rudolph Mate stated that he will sign only local actors for this picture but the production staff will be mostly foreign.

Mate and Saint Georges also are preparing a modern comedy to coproduce with Finos Film, again starring Aliki Vouyouklaki. The musical score will be written by Manos Hatzidakis.

Swedish director Ingmar Bergman is expected in Athens early this year to prepare a new picture. It will be filmed in Rhodes and will be based on a story of a Scandinavian family immigrated to Rhodes the 17th Century. The film will start rolling next April and out of the 12 principal roles, three or four will be given to Greek actors.

Danny Kaye, Melina Mercouri and Peter Lawford are the leading actors in the film "The Five Pieces of Maria" produced by Norman Panama and directed by Melvyn Frank now shooting in Athens.

Producer Hal Wallis plans also to shoot the final sequences of his new picture "Decision at Delphi" late this summer in Athens and Delphi.

Italian director Maura Bolognini has announced, too, that most of the exterior footage of his new film, based on a story taking place during a Mediterranean pleasure cruise, will be shot in the Greek Islands.

In Chile They Reform Reformers But It Turns Out a Jumble

By HANS EHRMANN

Santiago.

Once upon a time there were three sweet old Chilean ladies. Their ages added up to well nigh two centuries and they wiled away the time of day watching films and deciding whether other people should watch them too. Thus they never lacked bedtime stories to put their grandchildren to sleep.

But for a Swede named Ingmar Bergman, this happy way of life could have continued for many a year. Moreover, one day in 1958, they rejected "Smiles of a Summer Night" as far too immoral for public screening. That day the Battle of the Censors began. It continues until this very day and an armistice is not yet in sight.

Bergman's "Smiles" soon had the sweet old Chilean ladies on the verge of tears. The press published

Greeks Take 700; Indie Fad Off

Athens.

A curiosity of Greek film booking in the last couple of years was the prominence of, and lack for, feature films from India. In a sense there was a flood. Resultantly Greeks tired of what was a novelty in screen diet. It may be stated that the long-and-still champion at the boxoffice here is United States product.

France's offerings do well in the two principal Greek cities but falter in the provinces, probably on the basis of their sophistication. Another curiosity of Greece is that European product with an English dubbing soundtrack grosses better here than if shown with their original tongues.

About 700 pictures are imported every year by Greece. During 1962, 377 were released in Athens first run theatres. The breakdown of admissions by producing company is as follows:

Italo Prod., Two Soviet Cos. in Multi-Pic Deal

Rome.

A multi-picture pact linking Coronet Films of Rome and Sovexport and Mosfilm of Moscow revealed here by Coronet topper Renzo DeConcini.

Local announcement reveals that Coronet and Mosfilm would collaborate on the following pix: "Waters of Spring," based on a story by I. Turgheniev; a film inspired by Fjodor Polotzov, a Russian hero of the Italian resistance war; a biopic on the life of John Reed, who wrote "Ten Days That Shook the World"; another based on the legend of Stenka Razin; and a final one inspired by the figure of Ivan Bolotnikov, another legendary Soviet hero.

Also discussed was the possibility of having Italo actors participate in upcoming Russian pix projects, specifically a new version, directed by Barbieri, of "Anna Karenina."

Coronet, which is already producing a pic now being made near Moscow by Giuseppe Bottarelli, "They Went East," also has signed a deal with Sovexport Film, giving the Italo firm all video rights to documentaries and animation pix made in Russia. A similar pact—but extended to theatrical rights as well—covers all Soviet-made cartoon pix.

On-the-Spot Look At Nostrils Lineup Tried On Continent by UA

Paris.

Norbert Auerbach, United Artists Continental manager, is just back from branch sales meetings in Hamburg, Berlin and Munich. This is part of a new outlook to get an on-the-spot feel and look at the different markets instead of assembling the whole European and Near East sales and publicity groups in one spot.

Auerbach claims it gives him a better local grasp of problems as well as closer ties with exhibitors and the actual UA branches. From now on, Auerbach will go to them instead of having them come to him. This also produces a greater interest in depth dates and closer ties with hinterland, as well as only the key, branches.

During his German trip he discussed sportlic campaigns, upcoming product, internal booking and indigenous problems. He also examined the beginnings of more interest and personal coordination between the head office here and its various branches in other areas and territories.

Auerbach was accompanied by Jerry Jurow, who heads the UA publicity office for Europe and the Near East. Jurow went into public relations matters with the various reps. He leaves for Puerto Rico this week to meet up with UA international veepee head Edith Pleshow who is winding a Latin American tour.

Latin America Market Facts

The Latin American market, as seen by U.S. distributors, is capsuleted as follows:

ARGENTINA

The third largest American market for U.S. films. Under terms of a two-year film agreement signed with the Motion Picture Export Assn. last year, U.S. distribs can bring in 200 pix a year. Total quota on all foreign pix is about 300 pix annually, including 30 Italian, 30 French, 30 Spanish, 30 German. Licenses for U.S. indies are issued on each bulk. No admission price restrictions on Buenos Aires first-runs. Remittances can be made freely at free rate of exchange. Dubbing into Spanish is prohibited. No preview censorship, though pix are classified. A 10% tax on all tickets for Film Institute; 10% for school construction; also municipal taxes.

BOLIVIA

No film agreement with MPEA. No import or remittance restrictions. No dubbing restrictions, but is not done anyway. There are only censorship boards. A 20% tax on admission prices. 200 pix imported annually, of which approximately two-thirds are from U.S.

BRAZIL

The number one market for U.S. film in Latin America. No formal agreement with MPEA. Each distributor must apply for his own import licenses. There is an exhibition quota requiring theatres to play one domestic film for every eight imported, or to devote 42 days a year to exhibition of domestic pix. Admission prices are controlled. Income tax law restricts producer - distrib from making more than 70% terms on regular pix, or 80% on super-spectacles. Remittances are free, but devaluation of cruzeiro has provided serious problems. No dubbing restrictions, but it's expensive and not popular. Total taxation on tickets averages out to about 25%. About 650 pix imported annually, with U.S. in lead as supplier, followed by Germany, France, Italy, Japan, England, Mexico, Spain and Argentina.

CHILE

Only one or two pictures produced a year. Complicated customs duties. About 300 pix imported annually, with ⅓ from U.S. Estimated to be the fifth largest L.A. market for U.S. pix.

COLUMBIA

No import agreement with MPEA. No restriction on imports and no exhibition quotas. Admission prices determined, but special pictures receive special consideration. No restrictions on rentals. Remittances by exchange certificates and free dollar checks. No dubbing restrictions, but not practiced. Federal and local admission taxes, averaging about 10%. About

Rental Realities Of Athens Studios

Athens.

Film studios, or so defined, are numerous enough in the Kingdom of Greece but they do not qualify in the main as very modern in equipment. Improved quality of facilities is an acknowledged difficulty if Greece is to attract more renting producers from elsewhere. Even so, a fair number of foreigners, notably Italians, have shot films here.

The best layouts are probably those of Alfa, Anzervos, Finos, all here in Athens.

The Alfa Studio has three stages. Stage A 60 x 100 x 30 ft. is convertible into unit of 30 x 24 x 30 ft. Its rent per day is $95.00.

Stage B is of 40 x 70 x 27 ft. and its rent per day is $70.00.

Stage C is of 100 x 60 x 60 ft. and its rent per day is $120.00.

There are two Sound Studios. Sound Studio A is of 60 x 30 x 30 ft. It is for music recording and final mixing. It includes 35 and 17.5 mm sound recorders, 6 or 8 channel Klang mixing consoles, full play-back system and projector. It is rented for music recording $30.00 per hour, for final mixing $21.00 per hour and for premixing screening $22.00 per hour.

Sound Studio B, is of 26 x 21 x 15 ft. and is equipped as Sound Studio A but it has a three channel console also. Its rent for post synchronization is $15.00 and for mixing $16.00 per day. There are tape recorders in full camera synchronization, microphones, talk-back etc. and their rent per day is $15.00. The sound transfer from magnetic to magnetic is charged $.08 per meter and sound transfer from magnetic to optical is $.06 per meter.

The camera equipment consists of two Arriflex complete with blimp, lenses, battery, battery charger, 400 ft. magazines, tripod, variable speed or synchronous motors, matte box and they are rented $15.00 per day. There is also One Arriflex 200 complete as the above with 1,000 ft. magazines which is rented $20.00 per day. Lighting equipments are rented for $1.10 per day and other miscellaneous items also.

There are editing rooms complete with Arri and or Steenbeck editing tables, four-way synchronizers, racks, bins etc. and it is rented $4.00 per day and the office rooms are rented $20.00 per week. Laboratory work is charged from $.15 per 5 feet.

The Anzervos Studio has more facilities than the Alfa Studio at the same rates and the Finos Film less than the Alfa but it is seldom available for foreign producers.

Argentine Film Features

[Recent or Prospective]

ARIES

"The Performance" — story by Beatriz Guido (Mrs Torre Nilsson), with Susana Freyre and Duilio Marzio. Miss Freyre has not made a picture in her native Argentina for some years.

Aries' other plans for the year, all for direction by Fernando Ayala and with Hector Olivera as producer, include "La Nina Punetilla," from a story by Augusto Roa Bastos, a modern comedy. This to be followed by "Marbilio" (The Little Buck), and finally a U.S.-Argentine coproduction, on a story not yet written. It will be recalled that this outfit produced the English version of "No Exit," which ran six weeks recently at the Sutton in New York.

ANGEL

"The Terrace" — story by Beatriz Guido, directed by Leopoldo Torre Nilsson; produced by Nestor Gallet. Some action shot in a B.Aires penthouse apartment swimming pool. Chile's Fouled-Up Censors their pictures, dubbed them the "Three Disgraces of Chilean Cinema" and, adding injury to insult, even printed their ages.

The regulations under which these ladies officiated originated in 1925 and had only undergone minor changes since then. Films were either approved without restrictions or classified for spectators over 15. The third alternative was outright rejection.

Reform was certainly called for and shortly afterwards made its appearance with new classifications: no restriction, over 14 and over 18. The composition of the Censorship Board was changed, bringing in one representative each from the Parent-Teacher Assn. of public and private (read Catholic) schools, the U. of Chile and the Catholic U. Two further members were designated by the President of the Republic from, respectively, the ranks of psychiatrists and ex-superior court justices and the director of the National Library became the Board's President.

This however turned out to be a case of improved legislation, marred in actual practice, and films continued falling by the wayside. The three member appellate court (Minister of Education, President of Supreme Court and a representative of the Bar) sometimes proved more liberal than the Board reversing its rejections, but the clamour in the press continued. At last, in April 1960, a much sought for amendment, establishing the classification of "over 21," became law.

Majority at 21

The basic idea of this innovation was that if the age of 21 made one eligible to run for Congress or for capital punishment it should also enable people to see adult films. For several months the Censorship Board acted accordingly, but soon afterwards 21 no longer was the age of consent and films were again rejected with alarming frequency. "Thou Shalt Not Kill," "Il Mondo Sexy de Notte" and "Les Liens sont Laches" are but three of approximately 30 films axed in 1962.

There are wheels within wheels behind this severity: the designation of the public school PTA representative has been bureaucratically stalled, depriving the liberals of a vital vote and conservatives often obtain a majority of the four member quorum, because their representatives on the Board were chosen among people with plenty of time on their hands who hardly ever fail to turn up at screenings, though payment of censors is so low that it can be considered nominal.

But the largest wheel is the failure of the local Catholic Censorship, equivalent to the U.S. Legion of Decency. No one pays much attention to its classifications, but there is a large number of people, Catholics and others, who take careful note of films forbidden as immoral in order to view them at the earliest opportunity. Hence there is strong pressure in the conservative sector of the State Censorship Board to apply Catholic standards of morality in its decisions.

Serious Failure

The failure of the "over 21" amendment is serious at a time when films, the world over, have tended to become more and more adult in their approach.

It has also had considerable side effects on local distributors. At a time when taxation on films is exceptionally heavy in this country, the economic effects of having a film rejected are highly damaging and self-censorship has been a logical consequence. A fair estimate would be that for each rejected film, another was never imported, to avoid the risk of a censorial thumbs down. There have also been instances of a distributor cutting risky scenes before submitting a film to the Censors, in order to stand a better chance of approval.

The press, with few exceptions, still takes a firm stand on Censorship, but it is unlikely that major changes will take place under the present conservative government.

As far as legislation on censorship is concerned there has been a definite improvement, but in actual practice we are no better off than in the bad old days when the three old ladies reigned supreme.

Principal Greek Distributors Of Prime Feature Product

Athens.

There are 65 film distributing organizations in the Kingdom of Greece but this statistic needs explaining. The majority are hole-in-the-wall handling two to five features annually. The more significant distributors are listed herewith. The figures given are for tickets sold. This is the only available fiscal guide here. Greeks don't tell about actual money revenues, not here or anywhere else. The Skouras name below are kin to the Spyros and George Skourases of New York City film business. The list:

1. TH. DAMASKINOS & V. MICHAELIDES S.A. 11,635,666

Irish Equity Protests Foreign Shows on Tele

Dublin.

Criticism of the volume of imported programs for Telefis Eireann (Irish TV) has been voiced by Irish Actors Equity through prexy Eddie Golden who says that TE has refused to limit the amount of foreign "canned" entertainment shows. He added that Equity did not want an outright ban, but a slowing down of the importation of films.

Golden also commented on the "appalling ratio" of foreign artists to Irish on TE—three hours a week of Irish, against 10 hours of foreign. Another criticism of TE was the low fees offered to variety performers, which Golden said could not possible attract the best.

Abbeyite Golden was re-elected prexy for the coming year.

'Bounty' Sails Free of Regulation Denying Teenagers Admission

Buenos Aires.

After some finagling, the Screen Institute qualification subcommittee reviewed classification of "Mutiny on Bounty" (MGM), originally restricted to teenagers. The picture is now in the "no restriction" class at the Metropolitan, now in third week. "Longest Day" (20th) is now in fifth round at the Broadway.
